EXTRACT FROM THE PREFACE TO THE
FIRST EDITION OF THE SECOND VOLUME, EXTENDING FROM THE COMMENCEMENT OF CHAPTER X.
TO THE TERMINATION OF CHAPTER XIX.

THIS Second Volume, compiled during the few intervals of leisure which could be gleaned from the laborious duties of the ministry, is at length presented to the public; but with considerable anxiety, lest it should disappoint the expectations excited by the former one, the first edition of which has been long since exhausted.

The civil and religious history of Ulster, during the eventful period embraced in this volume, I have endeavoured to illustrate with fidelity and exactness, confining my attention exclusively to the affairs of this province, and exhibiting with the utmost care the various sources whence I derived the information which is now for the first time published. Though my researches were necessarily limited, through want both of sufficient time and of adequate pecuniary resources, I have succeeded in bringing to light many original documents connected with the civil and ecclesiastical affairs of the north of Ireland hitherto buried in obscurity; while, from the invaluable treasures of the British Museum and the Advocates' Library, I have been enabled to add considerably to the history of Ulster during the civil war and the Protectorate, and to trace, more minutely than preceding writers had done, the rise and progress of that successful resistance to the arbitrary government of James the Second by which the REVOLUTION was consummated on the plains of Ulster.

To Sir William Betham, Knt., Foreign Secretary to the Royal Irish Academy; Sir Archibald Edmonstone, Bart., Kilsyth; Alexander Macdonnell, Esq., Dublin Castle; the Rev. John Lee, D.D., F.R.S.E., principal clerk to the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland; David Laing, Esq., Edinburgh; George Matthews, Esq., Dublin; and the Rev William Bruce, D.D., Belfast, my acknowledgments are due for favouring me with access to unpublished papers, and with other important facilities in the prosecution of my inquiries.

Owing to the press of new and interesting matter, which I was unwilling to withhold and unable to condense, this volume has so far exceeded the limits I had calculated on, that I have been reluctantly compelled to close the narrative a few months earlier than I had intended, and to withdraw several documents which I had selected for publication in the Appendix.

To these volumes I propose, "if the Lord will," to add a THIRD and concluding one, in which the narrative will be continued to the present time, and to which will be appended several authentic tables and other documents, exhibiting the statistics and existing position and circumstances of the PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH IN IRELAND.

THE General Assembly, to which the Rev. John Drysdale, minister of Portaferry, and Captain James Wallace, of Argyle's regiment, were sent as commissioners, had been appointed to meet at the usual period in the month of May, but the pressing exigencies of the ecclesiastical affairs of the empire rendered an earlier meeting indispensable. The Westminster Assembly having completed the Directory for Public Worship, and having, after lengthened debates, also drawn up certain "Propositions concerning church-government and ordination of ministers,"<sup>1</sup> embodying the general principles of presbyterial government; and both these measures having been approved by the parliament, the Scottish commissioners in London recommended a special meeting of the General Assembly to be called, for the purpose of giving their assent to these important steps towards the covenanted uniformity in religion. This meeting accordingly took place at Edinburgh on the 22nd of January, 1645.

The Presbyterians of Ulster, having received timely notice of this Assembly, drew up petitions in different parts of the province, and forwarded them by their commissioners. Among these applications were, not only the customary general petition from "The distressed Christians in Ulster for a further supply of ministers," but also one from General Monro, desiring the Assembly to send a suitable minister to officiate to his regiment at Carrickfergus, and several other petitions from the city of Londonderry, and the surrounding districts of Derry and Donegal, requesting that some ministers might be specially sent to visit that populous Presbyterian settlement.

In answer to the first of these applications—all of which received the most kind and ready attention—the Assembly, for the FOURTH time, issued the usual "Commission for ministers to go to Ireland," which was to take effect so soon as the brethren appointed by the preceding Assembly should have completed their term of service; "And therefore," say the Assembly in this commission, "we do hereby authorise and give commission to the persons following, to wit, Mr. Alexander Blair, minister of Galston, and Mr. Robert Hamilton, minister of Ballantrae, for the first three months, beginning upon the first day of July, and to continue till the last day of September; Mr. Samuel Row, minister at Kirkmabrick, and Mr. Alexander Livingston, minister at Carmichael, for the next three months, beginning the first day of October, and to continue till the last day of December; Mr. Henry Colwart, minister at Paisley, and Mr. Henry Semple, minister at Killearne, for the last three months, beginning the first day of January, 1646, and to continue till the last day of March in the said year; to repair unto the north of Ireland, and there to visit, comfort, instruct, and encourage the scattered flocks of Christ—according to the direction of Jesus Christ, and according to the doctrine and discipline of this Church in all things.”

To meet General Monro's application for a chaplain, the following provision was made:—"The Assembly desire Messrs. David Dickson, Andrew Cant, Robert Blair, and John Livingston, to consider of an able, well-qualified young man fit to be minister to General-Major Monroe and his regiment, which being now the head-quarters, and lying in an eminent place [Carrickfergus], the key of these northern parts in Ireland, doth, for these and many other reasons, require an able man." They also wrote a letter to the general himself, expressing their sympathy with the army in their privations, and assuring him that they had warmly recommended his case to the Scottish Parliament, then sitting, and that they duly appreciated his services on behalf of the Church. "It was," say they, "most refreshing unto us, when we heard, as from those who were sent from your Presbytery, so from some of our commissioners who were sent from us for to labour for a season in the Lord's work there, of your forwardness and zeal in advancing that work, and resolute assistance ye gave unto the Presbytery. We pray the Lord to bless you, and entreat you to go on without fainting, as you would have the Lord to countenance you in your employment, and others to be mindful of you."

Nor was their care for the due religious instruction of the army in Ireland confined to the general's regiment. At the Assembly in 1643, the Viscount Ards, or, as he was more generally styled, the Lord Montgomery, had also applied for a chaplain to be sent over to his regiment,<sup>2</sup> and the commission of the Church had subsequently nominated a minister to that charge; but the present meeting, finding he had not yet complied with that appointment, urged his immediate departure in terms of the following minute:—"The General Assembly, understanding that Mr. James Nasmith was appointed by the commissioners of the late Assembly to attend the Lord Montgomerie's regiment, and having heard the said Mr. James, personally present, finds that he hath been too slow in repairing to that regiment, and therefore ordains him to go unto the said regiment presently without any delay."

The petitions from Derry and its vicinity were next taken into consideration; and though the Assembly had already appointed the usual number of their brethren to visit the north of Ireland generally, yet feeling the strong claims of that extensive district for a special supply of ministers, they made the following additional appointment:—"The General Assembly, having considered the petitions presented unto them in behalf of the counties near Londonderry for ministers, do appoint Mr. Hugh Kennedy for the first time, Mr. Andrew Lauder for the second, Mr. George Hutchinson for the third time, to repair thither for performing ministerial duties, each of them for the space of three months, the first of them beginning the 1st of July next."

The interference of the Assembly was solicited in another matter connected with that part of the country, arising out of the intolerant conduct of Thornton, the mayor of Derry, whose hostility to the Scots has been already noticed. It appears that, in accordance with the directions of a previous Assembly, the commission of the Church had, in 1644, sent over several brethren to Derry, to supply the churches in that city and surrounding district;<sup>3</sup> and that Thornton, the bigoted abettor of prelacy, had violently opposed these ministers, and endeavoured to thwart their efforts for supplying the Presbyterians in that quarter with the preaching of the Gospel. In particular, it seems that he had, in public and official letters, maliciously slandered and otherwise injured one of these ministers, the Rev. Mr. John Burne. Complaint was accordingly made to the present Assembly, both by the calumniated minister himself, as well as by the Presbyterians of that neighbourhood, who commissioned the Rev. Robert Cunningham, formerly a Conformist minister, but now a preacher at St. Johnston, near Derry, to lay their petitions before the Assembly, and, if necessary, to repair to the parliament in London to obtain redress, and to urge them to take the steps requisite for extending to Ulster the ecclesiastical reforms which they had already effected in England. The Assembly, conceiving the Church of Scotland to be insulted in the person of their commissioner, readily took cognisance of the case, and, in the customary form of procedure, remitted it to the consideration of their committee of bills. On the 5th of February, the following report, containing all the information which can now be obtained respecting this case, was submitted to the Assembly:—"The committee of bills and overtures having read and considered all the papers remitted to them by the General Assembly in the matter of Mr. Thornton, mayor of Londonderry, his slandering of Mr. John Burne; these are to say, a very invective letter direct to the said Mr. John, subscribed by the aforesaid mayor his own hand, together with a more invective one entitled, 'The justification of his letter to

Burne,' a copy whereof was presented to the said committee by Captain Wallace, asserting upon his honesty the same to be veram copiam, and obliging, if it should be found necessary, to produce the principal, together also with the several petitions subscribed by many in and about Londonderry, wherein are largely and feelingly regretted the manifold abuses the said Mr. John, with his colleagues, sustained of the disaffected there; wherein also the said brethren their good carriage and godly behaviour much tending to the promoting of the Lord's work during their abode in Ireland, is largely to their commendation expressed; the said committee, having seriously considered the premises, find the said Mr. John very much wronged, and the Kirk of Scotland through him, and earnestly recommends the same to the Assembly, that they, in their wisdom, may think on the best way to take order with the same."

The Assembly immediately approved of this report, and resolved that the case should be laid, not only before the Scottish Parliament, then sitting, but also before the English Parliament, through the medium of their commissioners attending the Westminster Assembly. The following is the letter which the Assembly wrote on this occasion to their commissioners in London, which it is necessary to insert, as it shows that the opposition of Thornton, at the head of the royalist faction, was designed to obstruct altogether the revival of Presbyterianism in that part of the province, and that therefore the interference of the Assembly was both justifiable and necessary:—

"Right honourable, reverend, and loving brethren,

"Whereas the bearer hereof, Mr. Robert Cunningham, preacher of God his Word, had commission from diverse parts of the north of Ireland to supplicate to the parliament of England for advancing and setting forward the work of reformation in that land, already begun, but through the means of some malignant commanders and ministers much interrupted, by having the lawful form of government, and the Directory of Worship now agreed upon, set up and established by due authority of the said parliament, and all malicious opposers of the said work duly censured and punished. Now, for the better furtherance of the said bearer in that which he hath to do with the said parliament, we do seriously recommend him to your care and assistance; and especially for obtaining redress of the notable injuries done to Mr. John Burne, and our other brethren sent to that kingdom to minister spiritual comfort to the distressed people there upon their earnest suite.<sup>4</sup> So, commending you to the Lord's grace, we continue your loving brethren,

“THE MINISTERS AND ELDERS MET IN THIS GENERAL ASSEMBLY.”

The Assembly was not content with this formal recognition of the petitions of the Ulster Presbyterians for a uniformity in religion with the sister kingdoms. In their public and official letter, written at the close of their meeting to their commissioners in London, they again express their anxiety that the

<sup>4</sup> I have not been able to ascertain the issue of this application to parliament. Other complaints were subsequently preferred against Thornton, who came to London, in the beginning of the year 1647, to obtain a settlement of his accounts with the parliament. But enormous errors being detected therein, he fled hastily from town, and returned to Ireland; upon which the commons, on the 25th of January, ordered him to be arrested and brought over to answer for an overcharge in his accounts, to the amount of no less than £27,524 13s. 10d.—Journ., v., 62. He did not, however, long survive, as, from the following notice of his peculations, he appears to have died before the end of that year:—“Monday, March 13, 1647—8. The committee of accounts made certificate to the House of Commons of the true state of the business prosecuted by Alexander Goring against Robert Thornton, late mayor of Londonderry, deceased, desiring a course might be taken for securing of the estate of the said Robert Thornton, towards the satisfaction of the sum of £26,000 and upwards, wherewith the said Mr. Goring charged him for provisions for relief of the poor distressed Protestants in Londonderry, and other public monies which the said Mr. Thornton had no ways satisfied or discounted for before his death.”—Rushworth, vii., 1024, 1025; Commons' Journals, v., 492.

Directory for Worship and the propositions respecting government, which they had just approved and adopted, should be speedily transmitted to Ireland by the parliament, who alone had authority or jurisdiction in that kingdom. They thus conclude that letter:—"It is earnestly desired that the Directorie for Worship be sent to Ireland; and that you recommend to the honourable houses of the parliament to think upon the best way for the establishment and practice of it in that kingdom; and that the like course may be taken with the government and other parts of the uniformity so soon as they shall be agreed upon."<sup>5</sup> The Assembly, having thus carefully attended to all the desires of their brethren in Ulster, expressed in their several petitions, dismissed Mr Drysdale and Captain Wallace with the following commendatory letter, addressed "To the reverend brethren of the Presbytery unto the army in Ireland.

"Seeing those of your members who were sent from you to us, having carefully attended in everything that was committed to them for their despatch from this Assembly, are now to return: we think fit to write with them unto you, hearing from them of your diligence and care in promoving of the great work of the Lord, notwithstanding of manifold oppositions, that you might be encouraged without fainting to go on unto the utmost of your power to set forward that work as watchmen entrusted by God, so that you may be, in these difficult times, not only a comfort of that army whereof you have the charge; but that you may also be for the strengthening and encouragement of that poor land wherein for the time ye are. There is ane 'Warning' sent out from this Assembly to the whole kingdom, and to the armies within and without the kingdom, which we earnestly recommend to you, that you would be careful to have it read in your several stations.<sup>6</sup> We commend you and the work in your hands to the Lord, and rest in him, your loving brethren,

“THE MINISTERS AND ELDERS CONVENED IN THIS ASSEMBLY.”<sup>7</sup>

Encouraged by these proceedings of the Assembly, the Presbytery prosecuted with renewed diligence the work of evangelising Ulster. One of their first measures, after the return of their commissioners, was to take steps for the instruction and conversion of the Roman Catholic population to whom they had access. But this laudable attempt, which, it is pleasing to notice, was, in accordance with the intolerant spirit of the that age, from which even the Presbyterians were not exempt, to be followed by the infliction of civil penalties on those who adhered to their errors. The proceedings of the Presbytery are thus narrated by Adair:—“About this time, April, 1645, the Presbytery finding the Irish Papists, partly who had not been in rebellion, partly who had come in under protection, to grow numerous in the country, and considering their numbers might thereafter prove dangerous to the Protestant religion, and that by the treaty between Scotland and England no toleration is to be given Papists; and also pitying their souls in their ignorant and hardened condition, made an act that they should be dealt with by the several ministers to convince them of their idolatry and errors, and bring them to own the truth; or otherwise to enter into process against them in order to excommunication. And they appointed some of their number to speak to the general-major, that he use that authority he hath for forcing them out of this part, and wholly out of the army if they remain obstinate. This act of the Presbytery was publickly intimated in the several parish churches."

During these proceedings, the last two ministers appointed by the previous Assembly in 1644, arrived and joined the Presbytery. One of these was the Rev. John Livingston, who now, for the third time since the Rebellion, visited Ulster, the seat of his early labours. He had the satisfaction, during his stay, of assisting at the settlement of two ministers in important charges in the country of Antrim. In the month of April, the Rev. DAVID BUTTLE was called to be their pastor by the Presbyterians of Ballymena and its vicinity, encouraged by Sir Robert Adair, who frequently sat as elder with the Presbytery;<sup>8</sup> and, about the same time, the Rev. ARCHIBALD FERGUSON was called to Antrim,<sup>9</sup> the people of which town had some time before, with the concurrence of Sir John Clotworthy, endeavoured, but without success, to obtain for their pastor Mr. Livingston, whose praise was throughout all the churches. A similar attempt was now made by the people of two other places. "The parishes of Newtownards and Killileagh supplicated the Presbytery to concur for a call to Mr. John Livingston (being then present at the Presbytery, and formerly a minister in Ireland), to their parishes, each of them endeavouring to have him. Mr. Livingston entered a protestation that these calls be not prejudicial to the interest of Stranraer, his parish and people in

<sup>8</sup> The Rev. Mr. Buttle, or Buttel, continued to be minister at Ballymena for above twenty years. He was imprisoned by the republican party in Carrickfergus in 1650. At a Visitation Presbytery, held in Ballymena in June, 1655, I find it stated that Mr. Buttle had his stipend of £40 per annum secured by the bond of Sir Robert Adair, but that he had neither glebe nor manse. In 1662 he was deposed, with the rest of his brethren, by Jeremy Taylor, the new bishop of Down and Connor. He nevertheless continued to officiate privately among his people till his death, the precise period of which I have not been able to ascertain; but I find another minister in this congregation in the year 1670, who had been probably ordained there a year or two previously.

Scotland. This motion, however, had no success. For though the parish of Killinchy did many years after that, in the year 1655, or thereabout, call Mr. Livingston, and he came to Ireland then for a visit upon their call, and Mr. Hamilton was also invited to Ballywalter; yet these motions for bringing back these worthy men to Ireland did not succeed. They had been driven out of this country, and were necessitated and clearly called to settle in Scotland thereafter, and became singularly useful there, and subject to the Assembly of the Church of Scotland and other church jurisdictions, who would not part with them. However, about this time Providence supplied the defect, partly by sending over a new supply of able ministers from Scotland one year after another by turns; and thereafter by sending over divers young men near together, in 1645 and 1646, besides Mr. Ferguson and Mr. Buttle." The reflections in which the historian of these events indulges at this period in his "NARRATIVE" are too just and striking to be omitted:—

"And here it were sinful to pass by and not to mark God's wonderful providence in ordering the beginning and foundation of a Church here; first raised out of the ruin and ashes into which it had been formerly brought through the prosecution of the prelates first, and then by a bloody rebellion and massacre by the barbarous Irish Papists; by which ruins it was brought very low, having before been but as an embryo. Then the first visible relief was by the Scotch army sent from Scotland against the Irish rebels; these generally consisting of officers who had no inclination towards religion, except in so far as the times and state who employed them seemed to favour it; only their chief commander, General-Major Monroe, was no unfriend, but a countenancer of these beginnings. However, the officers generally were profane, and the bulk of the soldiers, yea, haters of the purity and power of religion. There was no visible encouragement in the country for planting a ministry in congregations. For the inhabitants were but few, and these much oppressed and burdened through the maintaining of the army, which was much neglected at this time in their pay, through mistakes between the parliament of England and some officers of the army sent thither: or, rather, the indiscreet management of the army's officers, by their commissioner, George Monroe. Besides, there was a stock of old Conformist ministers in the country, who had for their own ends gone along with the Covenant, and yet returned to their former disposition. They were labouring to carry a faction in the country and army for their way, and had many to back them, especially men of most note both in army and country, and in whose eyes the little beginning of a Presbytery was despicable; consisting at first only of a few in the army, and two new planted in the country. Insomuch that divers of them did refuse to appear before the Presbytery; and others who did appear denied their authority, having then no shadow of establishment by king or parliament, and thereafter, when times seemed better, very little countenance from authority. It was also the wonderful hand of God to bring men from Scotland at this time (for from England none could be had of sound principles, having then some encouragement at home, and having antipathy to come to Ireland); considering that Scotland had then use for hopeful young men to plant among themselves. And almost none came hither who had not calls from congregations to stay there in their own native country, among their friends, having proportion of settled maintenance. Whereas, coming here, they came to a place unsettled, where was a mixture of three divers nations, their maintenance neither competent nor what was promised secured to them, and coming moreover during the time of a bloody war, when nothing was settled in the country. That these few young men should have hazarded themselves in such a case was the Lord's hand overruling them; and it was more His hand that they were, in any tolerable measure, helped in their so difficult and discouraging a work; considering they were but young, not attained to maturity of judgment, nor having had any experience in the government of the Church, especially in the midst of difficulties, and none of the old stock, who had been there before, were settled among them. Yet God helped these young men into a diligent following of their duty, not only in their own congregations where they did reside, but in watering desolate congregations in the country, and in keeping presbyterial meetings. Insomuch, that sometimes they were necessitated to be as often abroad in other congregations in the country for supply, and for stirring up the people for their own supply, as in their own; and this by the appointment of the presbyterial meetings, upon petition from these desolate places. These young men then minding their work, and delighting therein, mutually comforting themselves in the company of one another at their meetings in the Presbytery, and not considering their present toil but with a kind of honest delight, not foreseeing the hazard they were in through the unsettledness of the times and many adversaries; which also they felt thereafter. And, indeed want of that sort of sagacity and anxiousness was their mercy; for had they foreseen but the half of what they after did meet with, their young raw spirits, not experienced in affliction, could not have digested it."<sup>10</sup>

During the summer of this year, the ministers appointed by the last General Assembly visited by turns the several vacant congregations, and no event occurred to interrupt the growing prosperity and extension of the Church. The confusion into which Scotland was now plunged, by the rapid and overwhelming successes of Montrose, was advantageous to the Scottish interest in Ulster. That gallant and enterprising, though cruel and vindictive, nobleman had taken up arms for Charles; and had placed himself at the head of several highland clans, reinforced by fifteen hundred Irish sent from Ulster by the Earl of Antrim:—the same who, under Alaster Macdonnell, as already related, had captured Messrs. Weir and Hamilton on their return to Scotland. By a succession of victories, followed with plunder and devastation to a fearful extent, Montrose spread consternation and terror throughout the whole of Scotland. His brilliant career of victory was, on the 15th of August, crowned by the decisive battle of Kilsyth, in which the forces of the Covenanters were routed; and no quarter being given, they were almost annihilated by the savage and unrelenting fury with which they were massacred in their flight. For a time the cause of Charles appeared to be triumphant throughout Scotland; and the more prominent leaders of the popular party, with many others desirous of escaping the evils of civil war, were compelled to retire from the kingdom. Ulster, which was now in comparative tranquillity, afforded them a favourable and convenient asylum; hither, therefore, numbers fled, who, being ultimately induced to settle in the country, tended considerably to increase the Presbyterian population. “Many families,” says Adair, “fled from Scotland to Ireland for shelter from the Earl of Montrose, who against six divers armies carried all before him, having overcome them in six battles; and these families not of the worst affected. And though persons of quality returned to Scotland again, yet many of the more common sort of people staid in the country, and added to the new Plantation here.”<sup>11</sup>

The Presbyterian interest in Ulster was still more effectually strengthened by the presence and countenance of the commissioners from the English Parliament, who came over, as already stated, in the latter end of October. Their appointment to the office of “governors of the province of Ulster” had taken place in the month of September, but the difficulty of providing the supplies which had been promised to be forwarded along with them retarded their departure.<sup>12</sup> The representations, made to parliament by the Scottish commissioners, in conformity with the Assembly's letter, together with the influence of the agent from Derry, the Rev. Mr. Cunningham, then in London, no doubt contributed to secure the appointment of these commissioners.<sup>13</sup> They were accompanied to Ireland by a chaplain, the Rev. Mr. Warr, and on their arrival they fixed their stated residence at Belfast. It was not long before an incident occurred which called for their interference on behalf of the Presbytery. Their conduct on this occasion, and the general course of their policy towards the Presbyterian Church, are thus narrated by Adair:—

“Toward the end of this year, 1645, the ministers of the Route, formerly mentioned, and others, take hold of a seeming opportunity to interfere with the Presbytery. The parliament of England having in October sent over the commissioners to Ulster, to rule the affairs of this country, viz., Mr. Annesley, afterwards the Earl of Anglesey, Sir Robert King, and Colonel Beale; these ministers, viz., Messrs. Fullerton, Watson, Vesey, and M'Neill, applied to them, accusing the

<sup>13</sup> The petition with which Mr. Cunningham was entrusted from the north of Ireland was read in the commons on the 16th of April, by whom it was specially recommended to the Westminster Assembly of Divines, “to consider how the desires of the petitioners, to be furnished with some able, learned, religious, preaching ministers, may be effectually granted to the relief and comfort of their souls.” Sir John Clotworthy, the steady friend of the Presbyterians of Ulster, was appointed to take charge of this matter.—Journ., iv., 113. Accordingly, on the 13th of May, the joint committee of lords and commons for the affairs of Ireland were directed to advise with the Assembly of Divines respecting the providing of proper ministers, and suitable means for their encouragement; and it was further voted by the commons, “That all such ministers as shall be willing, and be approved of, to go into Ireland, shall have, for their present subsistence and maintenance, one hundred pounds per annum, each of them.”—Journ., iv., 544. The next notice I find of this subject is on the 4th of January, 1647, when the commons appointed a committee to prepare an ordinance for establishing and settling the same form of church-government in the kingdom of Ireland as is or shall be established in the kingdom of England; they are further to consider of some fit ways and means for the advancing and maintaining a preaching ministry in the kingdom of Ireland.—Journ., v., 40.

Presbytery of bringing a foreign jurisdiction against the laws of Ireland, that the Presbytery take on them to exercise authority over them, &c. Of which the commissioners gave notice to the Presbytery, sending them a copy of the said libel. And they met with these commissioners at Belfast by translating the Presbytery thither, when they sent some of their members to the commissioners, to give them satisfaction as to these accusations and reflections. Which they having done, the commissioners were satisfied. But withal the Presbytery told the commissioners they did not appear before them in answering the libel, as their proper judges in matters ecclesiastical; but as persons in the quality and station they were now in, as they were bound to do to all men, and especially to those in civil authority. Here the commissioners sat in Presbytery, the Presbytery was encouraged and countenanced, and the other dismissed without satisfaction. The commissioners also did give order, at the Presbytery's desire, that the Covenant should be tendered to such as had not taken it at Carrickfergus, Belfast, Lisnegarvey, &c., which was done accordingly. They also did give a right of the tythe of parishes to as many of the new intrants as did apply to them; and did add the civil sanction to the Presbytery, and gave commission to cognosce upon the lives and abilities of scandalous ministers in the Lagan, encouraging the Presbytery if they found cause to pass censure on them, which accordingly was done. Some said this gratifying the Presbytery was a piece of emulation and State policy, they finding General-Major Monroe and the army had a great stroke in this country and in Ulster, partly through countenancing these courses. Therefore they would not be behind them in giving all countenance to the Presbytery. However, this did much daunt these sorts of ministers at that time, and did strengthen the hands of the few new beginners. For at this time there were none settled of the country ministers but two [Mr. Drysdale and Mr. Baty, in

Down]; and in Antrim but other two, Mr. Buttle and Mr. Ferguson; and the other party were many in all parts of the country. It is true some unfriends did reflect at this time as if the Presbytery had taken commission from the magistrate to exercise their authority, and some friends did scruple at the first offer made by the commissioners; because then the Erastian spirit much prevailed in the parliament of England. But the commissioners at the very first assured them it was not to make the Presbytery or their discipline subordinate to the magistrate; but only an accumulative power which they intended, and which accordingly they did give them by their commission or warrant. Upon this, the appointed ministers and elders went to the Lagan, preached daily, erected sessions, took depositions against scandalous ministers, and made way for calling ministers to congregations. And there the people of the country did accuse divers of these ministers, and brought in witnesses, making evident their lewd lives and unministerial carriage. Upon which they were first suspended by the commissioners, and then deposed by the Presbytery. And the people thereafter petitioned the Presbytery by Captain Hamilton and Captain Kennedy, for supply of ministers by turns, the whole of the country being then void of ministers except one, Mr. Robert Cunningham, who had been a Conformist, and then seemed to be serious in the profession of the truth, and was then at Taboin, alias St. Johnston. Upon which the Presbytery did send them ministers, the commissioners also concurring with the desire, by turns, as they became able and in any measure furnished; and continued the supply till the Lagan got some little stock of ministers amongst themselves.

“At this time, the Lord helped the very small number of ministers in the Presbytery to diligence in stirring up the parishes in the country, that were then all generally desolate, to seek after ministers and consider some way of maintaining them. For which end they appointed one minister and four or five of the most knowing elders, who had weight in these parts, to the principal parishes which wanted. And this was not without fruit: for the parishes set about means for that end, as they were in a capacity, which was the means of hastening divers young men out of Scotland, as was before related. The fewness and weakness of the Presbytery at this time was supported by God's special countenance, by the honesty of the men, and by the goodness of their cause and intentions; as well as that the commander of the Scotch army did in his own person usually sit with them at Carrickfergus, besides divers other officers who were elders of other regiments. And thereafter it was a great encouragement that the commissioners of the parliament of England did own the actings of the Presbytery. So that, though God did not build His temple here by might nor by power, yet so much of the countenance of these in power and authority as was necessary, for the day of small things was not wanting in the beginning."

The efforts of this small band of faithful and resolute ministers to supply the Presbyterian population with the preaching of the Gospel were, in several quarters, still thwarted by the Conformist clergy. Mr. Buttle, of Ballymena, was, in particular, opposed by the Rev. Dr. Colville, an eager and intolerant prelatist, although a Scotchman, who was then resident on his estate in that neighbourhood. He had been one of the few clergymen who joined in the petition to Strafford to impose the black oath on his countrymen in Ulster; and he now railed against the Presbyterian ministers, as intruders, not only into the ministry, but into the province. He possessed considerable property in the county; yet, notwithstanding his wealth and influence, and his contempt of their authority, the Presbytery determined to proceed against him. Their process, however, was suspended, in consequence of the interference of the English commissioners, who were anxious to bring over a person of his weight to the side of the parliament. Their proceedings against this formidable opponent are thus recorded in the artless narrative of Adair:—

“The Presbytery at this time, and a while before, did use great diligence to convince Doctor Colville of divers unsuitable carriages, both in private discourse with some of their number, and by summoning him before the Presbytery, and had witnesses to prove these allegations against him. But he never appeared, except one time before the commissioners at Belfast; at which time he would not direct his speech to the moderator, but to the commissioners. He had also beforehand applied to the commissioners, vindicating himself and insinuating on them. Upon this they desired the Presbytery to deal with him as favourably as they could, in regard they had use for the doctor in reference to their affairs in the country; he being a man knowing that way. The Presbytery had gone so far before the commissioners came over, that he was publickly prayed for in order to excommunication. Yet thereafter they found it not convenient to proceed further; and some knowing friends thought it had been greater prudence to have let him alone; since he now owned subordination, and did not preach.<sup>14</sup> However, his wife and son did take the

<sup>14</sup> Mr. Alexander Colville was, on the 6th of September, 1626, admitted vicar of Coole, or Carnmoney, on the presentation of Edward, Lord-Viscount Chichester; in which parish he succeeded Mr Glendinning on his removal to Oldstone, or Muckamore. (See Vol. I., p. 99.) Two years afterwards, on the presentation of Charles I., Mr. Colville was made precentor of Connor and rector of Ballymoney. He was doctor of divinity in 1636, when he was present at the funeral of the first Viscount Montgomery of the Ards. (Mont. MSS., p. 112.) He enjoyed several other Church preferments, and resided on his property at Galgorm, afterwards called Mount-Colville, in the neighbourhood of Ballymena. His son, Sir Robert Colville, Knight, about the year 1675, purchased from the second Earl of Mount Alexander, the estate of Newtownards, where he and his descendants chiefly resided, until it was sold, in 1744, by Robert Colville, Esq., to Alexander Stewart, father of the first Marquis of Londonderry. Sir Robert's grand-daughter and heir married the first Lord Mountcashel, by whose family the estate of Galgorm was, until lately, possessed. The reader will find a curious character of Sir Robert, who was active at the Revolution, in Henry, Lord Clarendon's "State Letters," vol. i., pp. 70, 71. See "Stat. Account of Irvine," for reference to Dr. Colville (Colvin) and his witchcraft. [The Galgorm estate is now the property of a Presbyterian, John Young, Esq., J.P., D.L., late High Sheriff of the county of Antrim.]

Covenant administered to them by Mr. David Buttle, and that by order of the Presbytery, in a public way; for the Presbytery received none into the Covenant but before the congregation. Yea, when the commissioners from the parliament begun to receive some to the Covenant privately, the Presbytery, hearing of it, sent to them and admonished them; whereupon they promised to forbear that way of administering it, and allow that those should take it again publicly."

While the parliamentary commissioners were thus favouring the Presbyterian interest in Ulster, they were not inattentive to the other and not less urgent part of their commission—that of organising a party in Ulster prepared, when called on, to support the parliament in opposition to the Scots. Mutual jealousies between these confederated allies had already ripened into public alienation, which not long after terminated in open hostility. The Independents, by means of the self-denying ordinance and the new elections, were rapidly gaining the preponderance both in the army and in the House of Commons. The Presbyterians, though supported by the city of London and an influential minority in parliament, as well as by the decided majority of the sober and intelligent part of the population, yet at this period rested chiefly upon the assistance of the Scots to enable them to secure that full measure of ecclesiastical reform to which all parties stood solemnly pledged by the Covenant. The Independents, though unable to withstand the almost universal desire of the people for the setting up of the Presbyterian government, had determined so to mutilate and cripple the new establishment as to render it obnoxious to its friends, and favourable to their own faction. With this view, the commons, by their celebrated vote of the 13th of May, afterwards embodied in their ordinance of the subsequent month of March, resolved to impose upon the Presbyterian Church in England the same Erastian yoke which had oppressed the prelatical Church, and to perpetuate the same abuse which still vitiates and nullifies its discipline—the right of appeal, in matters purely spiritual, from the ecclesiastical to the civil courts. The parliament sought to take away from sessions and presbyteries the power of suspension from the Lord's table; or, at all events to subject it to the control of the State. They appointed lay commissioners, with power to modify or reverse ecclesiastical censures; to every unworthy person excluded from communion they gave the right of appeal to these commissioners; and the parliament itself was constituted the last resort in all disputed cases of discipline! As might be expected, the Scots and the Presbyterian party warmly opposed these measures. The Westminster Assembly in particular, "felt the greatest repugnance to the interference of the civil power in the question of disqualifications to participate in religious ordinances, and petitioned the two houses accordingly. They went so far in their petition as to say, that, if the ministers and elders were not sufficiently authorised to keep away all wicked and scandalous persons from the sacrament, they foresaw that not only they, but many of their godly brethren, must be put to the hard choice, either to forsake their stations in the Church, or to partake in the sins which must result, and they added that, in that alternative, they were resolved, with God's grace, to choose affliction rather than iniquity."<sup>15</sup>

This collision on the subject of religion was succeeded by jealousies respecting the Scottish army in the north of England. The presence of this force gave increased confidence and weight to the Presbyterian party in the city and in the parliament, which they would not otherwise have possessed; the policy of their opponents, therefore, obviously was to excite such suspicions of the sincerity of these forces, and such complaints of their inactivity and of the burden of their support, as to lead to their speedy removal out of the kingdom.

With this view the majority in the parliament, during the month of October, published several declarations of a hostile nature. "They resolved that the continuance of the Scots army in the northern parts was not only unserviceable, but prejudicial to the ends for which their assistance had been desired, and destructive to those parts of the kingdom; and that their laying contributions and raising money upon the subjects of this kingdom was contrary to the treaty. The two houses further declared that the inhabitants were free from any obligation to pay these impositions, and once again demanded that the Scottish garrisons should be removed from Carlisle, Newcastle, and the other fortresses in the north which they at present held."<sup>16</sup>

In pursuance of the same line of policy, the parliament, on the 13th of November, voted that the garrison of Belfast should be surrendered by the Scottish forces to their commissioners in Ulster on or before the 11th of January.<sup>17</sup> Letters to this effect were accordingly despatched to the Scottish Parliament, then sitting at Edinburgh, which were received in the end of December; and about the same time possession of the town was formally demanded from Colonel Home, commander of the garrison, who refused to comply without instructions from the estates of Scotland. Monro accordingly, on the 26th of December, wrote to the Scottish Parliament, informing them of this unexpected demand, and requesting directions how to proceed; at the same time, expressing his decided opinion, "if they condescendit to the Englishe to pairt with the toune of Belfast, that they might lykwayes pairt with all their interest in Ireland.”<sup>18</sup> This letter was received and read in the parliament on the 15th of January, and referred to the “Committee of Dispatches,” who replied to Monro, but what the tenor of their reply was cannot be ascertained. No formal surrender, however, of the town took place;<sup>19</sup> and soon after a circumstance occurred which caused a change in the policy of the parliament, and rendered it inexpedient for them, at this crisis, to repeat the ungracious demand, or to come to an open rupture with the Scots. This circumstance was the unexpected arrival of Charles in the quarters of the Scottish forces at Newark.

<sup>17</sup> I find that on the 13th of December letters were received by the "committee of both kingdomes," then at Edinburgh, from Ireland, "anent the posture of affairs in that kingdome; and desyring that commissioners from Scotland with speed may be sent to Ireland, for the joynt managing of the warre ther."—Balf. iii., 332. It does not appear, however, that these were sent over; for, on the 15th of June, 1646, the commons gave their own commissioners power to act alone.—Journals, iv., 578 and 689.

The King had never been able to recover from the loss which he sustained in the fatal battle of Naseby. During the remainder of the campaign his forces were wholly unable to resist those of the parliament, his military resources were exhausted, and the defeat of Montrose in Scotland extinguished the hope which he once confidently entertained of retrieving the fortune of his arms. His only alternative was intrigue and negotiation. Fully apprised of the dissensions which had lately sprung up between the two great parties among his opponents, the Independents and Presbyterians, he now endeavoured to profit by their jealousies; and, by a secret correspondence with both, he sought to induce either the one or the other to adopt him as their ally against their rivals. "I am not without hope," he writes, in March, 1646, to one of his confidential friends, "that I shall be able so to draw either the Presbyterians or Independents to side with me for extirpating the one or the other, so that I shall be really king again."<sup>20</sup> "To the Independents he urged the tyranny of the Presbyterians, and the necessity of combining with him for their own security. To the Presbyterians he represented that the Independents were averse to monarchical government, and would sacrifice the interest of Scotland to their levelling principles, and that, therefore, their only chance of safety lay in joining with him, in order to subdue the Independents."<sup>21</sup> These negotiations, however, were ineffectual; both parties had too many proofs of his hypocrisy to trust to his professions; and the Scots though more favourable to his cause than the Independents, wholly refused to co-operate with him, except on the conditions which they had originally proffered, and to which they steadfastly adhered—his subscribing the Covenant, and concurring in establishing Presbytery in England as he had done in Scotland. These concessions Charles was resolved not to make; but the urgency of his situation at Oxford, surrounded and almost blockaded by the parliamentary forces under the dreaded Fairfax, his victor at Naseby, rendered further negotiation impracticable. He therefore resolved, as his only hope, to join the Scottish forces without any previous agreement, and to try what effect might be produced in his favour by the sight of his present humiliation, the remembrance of his former dignity, the possible revival of their hereditary attachment to the ancient line of their kings, and his own subtle arts of intrigue and dissimulation. Accordingly, in the latter end of April, he left Oxford at midnight, disguised as a servant to Ashburnham, one of his own attendants, and carrying a portmanteau behind him on his horse. He was accompanied by a clergyman well acquainted with the cross-roads of the adjoining counties; and after several narrow escapes, on the morning of the 5th of May—the ninth day after his departure from Oxford—he arrived at the Scottish camp before Newark. This unexpected event terminated the first civil war, after it had continued for four years; and gave the Scots and the Presbyterian party, now in possession of the King a temporary ascendancy over the parliament and the Independents.<sup>22</sup>

<sup>19</sup> The vote of the parliament for the surrender of Belfast was grounded on this plea, that the original treaty between England and Scotland did not warrant the troops of the latter to possess any garrison save Carrickfergus and Coleraine.—Com. Journ., iv., 340. The commons persisted in this demand (see Journals, iv., 353, 443, 544, 578, and particularly 608); but the lords, who were more favourable to the Presbyterian party, appear to have been reluctant to concur in it, as it was not till after repeated messages from the other house that they agreed to it on the last day of July, 1646.—Com. Journ., iv., 622, 625, 631. During the negotiations with the Scots throughout the remainder of the year, the subject was not resumed; but the moment that the latter had evacuated England, and the parliament had gained possession of the King, one of their first steps was, on the 4th of Feb., 1647, to appoint commissioners to repair to the Scottish estates at Edinburgh, with instructions to renew the demand for the surrender of Belfast, in the following urgent terms:—“You are to press with all the instance that you can, the present delivery of the said town and the castle there, it being a thing so much concerning the forces in that kingdom.”—Com. Journ., v., 74.

The effect of this suspension of hostilities was felt in Ireland. The English commissioners relinquished, for the present, their design of obtaining exclusive possession of Belfast. They were content to reside there, though garrisoned by the Scots, with whom they cordially co-operated against the Irish, now united with Ormond on behalf of the King. In the month of March a treaty of peace had, notwithstanding the violent opposition of the papal nuncio, been at length concluded by that nobleman with the supreme council of the confederates at Kilkenny. This peace, however, instead of allaying, only increased the commotions in Ireland. It raised up a third, or extreme Catholic party, headed by the nuncio, in opposition to the more moderate, or confederate Romanists, who had joined Ormond. The former, being destitute of military strength, paid court to Owen Roe O'Neill and the Ulster Irish, and persuaded that experienced general to join their standard, and declare against the peace. One of the first effects of this coalition was the reinforcement of O'Neill's army, and his descent upon Ulster, with nearly five thousand foot and five hundred horse. In the meantime, Monro and the English commissioners had previously resolved to take the field. Having collected about four thousand foot, with eleven troops of horse and six field-pieces, and having despatched a messenger to Colonel George Monro, at Coleraine, with directions to meet them on their march, they proceeded, on the 2nd of June, towards Armagh. The Marquis of Argyle's regiment, having returned only two days before from Scotland, after the defeat and dispersion of Montrose's forces, could not be prepared in time to join the army. They were, therefore, left under the command of Campbell of Auchinbreck, to protect the quarters at Carrickfergus. The English commissioners accompanied Monro as far as Dromore, whence they returned to Belfast.

On the 4th, Monro despatched a party of horse, under his lieutenant, Daniel Monro, to proceed by way of Benburb to meet Colonel Monro, who was advancing by Dungannon with above two hundred infantry and three troops of horse, and to direct him to rendezvous at Glasslough on the following day. This small party unexpectedly encountered the Irish vanguard near Armagh; and, by means of a prisoner whom they took, Monro was informed that the enemy, to the number of five thousand, with twelve troops of horse, were on their march from Glasslough, with the view of taking up a position at Benburb and Charlemont. The general accordingly recalled his party under Lieutenant Monro, and marched that night to Hamilton's Bawn. Early on the morning of Friday, the 5th of June, he advanced towards Armagh, purposely in sight of O'Neill's camp, to deter him from detaching any part of his force to intercept Colonel Monro. He did not succeed, however, in this manœuvre; a party was sent to attack the colonel, but the latter drove them back. Finding the enemy in possession of the pass and bridge at Benburb, and strongly entrenched, Monro proceeded to cross the river Blackwater further up, at Kinnard or Caledon, which he effected without molestation. Both parties, being now on the same side of the river, prepared for battle. O'Neill, observing the approach of the Scots, despatched Colonel Richard O'Ferral to occupy a pass on their march; but Lieutenant-Colonel Cunningham, supported by the artillery, soon compelled O'Ferral to retire, and cleared the way for the advance of the cavalry, who, in the absence of Colonel George Monro, were commanded by Lord Montgomery of the Ards. The detachment from O'Neill's army, which had been repulsed by Colonel Monro, now rejoined the main body of the Irish, although the colonel was unable to effect a junction with the Scots. The latter were not only weakened by the want of this expected reinforcement, but they were much jaded and fatigued, having been on their march for above twelve hours, and consequently fought under considerable disadvantage. About six o'clock in the afternoon, both armies engaged; and soon after O'Neill, finding he had the advantage in numbers as well as in position, ordered his troops to advance to the assault. "His orders were well executed; the English regiment, commanded by Lord Blaney, maintained their ground till he and most of his men were cut off. But O'Neill's cavalry soon broke into the Scots' horse, who being pushed and falling foul on their foot, disordered the whole body, and a general rout ensued. Sir James Montgomery's regiment was the only one which retired in a body; all the others fled in the utmost confusion, and most of the infantry were cut in pieces. Colonel Conway, after having two horses shot under him, made his escape almost miraculously to the Newry, with Captain Burke and about forty horse. Lord Montgomery was taken prisoner with about twenty-one officers and one hundred and fifty common soldiers. There were found 3243 slain on the field of battle, and others were killed the next day in the pursuit. O'Neill had only about seventy killed and two hundred wounded; he took all the Scots' artillery, being four field-pieces, with most of their arms, thirty-two colours, their tents and baggage. The booty was very great; fifteen hundred draught horses being taken, and two months' provisions for the Scots' army; enough to serve the Ulster Irish (an hardy people, used to live on potatoes and butter, and content generally with only milk and shoes) double the time. Monro fled without his wig and coat to Lisnegarvey, and immediately burnt Dundrum, deserted Portadown, Clare, Glenavy, Downpatrick, and other places; sent for the Lagan forces to his assistance, and ordered the country to rise, every household being to furnish two musketeers. This caused a general consternation; great numbers fled into Scotland; and the counties of Down and Antrim would have been lost, in a great measure, if either by accident or by any adventurous policy, all Monro's ammunition had not been blown up when the battle was lost; and if the nuncio, who received the news of the victory on June 13th, at Limerick, had not despatched an express to O'Neill to congratulate his victory, and to desire him to march with his forces to support him in his opposition to the peace. The messengers overtook O'Neill at Tandragee as he was ready to fall into the Scots quarters; yet to show his obedience to the nuncio, he resolved to march with his whole army towards Kilkenny. He accordingly quitted the opportunity of conquests in Ulster, and marched into Leinster; his soldiers making horrible depredations in the country."<sup>23</sup>

<sup>23</sup> Carte, i., 576, 577. The account of this battle given in the text is taken from O'Neill's Journal, which is printed at length in Des. Cur. Hib., ii., 341—47, and 502—6; and though the victory was a most decided one, yet the loss of the Scots is considerably exaggerated by the Irish general. I subjoin Monro's version of the concluding part of the engagement, and of the cause of his defeat, taken from his letter to the English Parliament, dated at Carrickfergus on the 11th of June, six days after the battle: — "About sunset I perceived the enemy making ready for a general assault, first with his foot, and his horse coming up behind his foot to second them. I had given order to a squadron of our horse to break through them before they should advance to our foot; that squadron of horse, consisting for the most part of Irish riders, although under the English command, did not charge, but retreated disorderly through our foot, making the enemies horse far to follow them, at least one squadron. Notwithstanding thereof, our foot stood to it, and received the enemies battalions, body to body, with push of pike; till at last our second squadron of horse charged the enemies horse, and fell pell-mell amongst our foot; who, being hurried into disorder, had no way of retreat but to wade the Blackwater when it was scarce fordable, and by that means, and the darknesse of the night, many of our foot escaped, with the losse of some few officers, six field-pieces, and some colours. So that by all appearance the Irish under the Lisnegarvey horsemen had a purpose to betray the army by their running away, leaving the foot to be cut down, who were also deserted by the rest of the horse, after retiring from their last charge:

The effect which this unexpected reverse of fortune produced is thus related by Adair:—"The British and Scotch armies received a sad blow at Benburb, near the Blackwater; they were wholly routed, and many slain, and some taken prisoners, among whom was the Lord of Ards, then a youth. This rout sadly alarmed the country, as well as the army, who were called together in divers companies to march to the borders of the country for defence of it against the enemy if he should pursue his victory, together with the scattered forces who had escaped the slaughter at the Blackwater. But the Lord restrained the remainder of the enemy's wrath; their general, being a bred soldier and a wary man, imagined the army and country would be as bears robbed of their whelps, and in a readiness to fight: whereas indeed they were but faint-hearted, and in a very evil case to encounter an enemy. But God saw the affliction of His people in the country at that time, and would not destroy the new bud of His own work, which was but beginning to spring up; and therefore He did withhold the barbarous Irish from further pursuing, which they might easily have done. Yet it is observable that, a while after this, when Sir Phelim O'Neill sent parties to prey upon the country, and drive the cows of such as they could, the places the enemy falling on our baggage, the baggage horses being all gone, they loved the spoyle better then to prosecute the victory. So that we lost of the foote, at the nearest conjecture, five or six hundred, and twenty officers were taken prisoners, the Lord of Ardes being one. We lost also many armes by reason the soldiers had above fifty miles to retire. And notwithstanding of all our losses, the enemy, as yet praised be God, hath not attempted to prosecute his victory within our quarters; and Colonel Monro, with his party, miraculously retreated home from the enemy, who viewed them, without the loss of a man. And now we are making up our forces again, having not lost of our horsemen above thirty, and one cornet who was killed." The Lord Blaney who was slain, was Henry, the second lord, who rescued the fort at Monaghan from the rebels shortly after the Rebellion, and held possession of it with his company till this fatal battle.—Lodge. vi., 311. Lord Montgomery of the Ards was carried by the Irish to the castle of Cloughouter, in Cavan, the same prison to which Bishop Bedell had been committed, where he continued closely confined for nearly two years.—Montg. MSS., p. 197. Among the slain was Captain James Hamilton, son of William of Newcastle, in the county of Down, brother to Lord Claneboy. There is a monument to his memory in the parish church of Clonfeckle, at Benburb.

where the Gospel was planted, though lying near these quarters where the rebels came, were preserved from plunder.

“Yet it is not to be forgotten that this stroke came by the righteous hand of God, especially upon the Scotch army. For many of the soldiers were prodigiously profane and wicked in their lives, and set themselves to prey upon the poor country scarce crept from under the ashes of a horrid rebellion; being secure, and without any apprehension of fear from the enemy, and so went to the fields for a prey rather than expecting any encounter, only fearing not to see the enemy, being so full of confidence in their own valour and the enemy’s cowardice. Therefore Providence so ordered that they were not together in a body when they met the enemy. Colonel George Monroe, son-in-law to the general-major, a proud self-willed man, having divided a considerable number of the forces and led them another way from Coleraine to meet the general-major before they should encounter the enemy. And the general-major on his march, finding the enemy almost between him and that party, did over-march the body of the army that very day on purpose to meet with Colonel Monroe’s party, and prevent the enemy meeting them alone. So that when they came to the view of the enemy the soldiery were tired and faint, as well as discouraged to see a very considerable force, and they without their expected aid. Besides, it was said the general-major at that time did not so manage the business as it might have been, and had not that spirit of command and conduct which usually he had; the Lord making all these things to concur for bringing a stroke upon a guilty proud party. The Presbytery, after this blow and danger in the country, ordered a day of public humiliation for the sins procuring it, and in a great measure yet remaining.”<sup>24</sup>

<sup>24</sup> The English commons, on the 20th of June, also “Ordered, that the ministers of the several parishes in and about London, do earnestly recommend in their prayers the languishing condition of the remainder of the poor Protestants in Ireland, ready to be

Though for a while the Presbytery were perplexed and alarmed by this sudden calamity, their labours in spreading the Gospel were not interrupted. The ministers appointed by the last General Assembly had terminated their period of service in the month of March. But soon afterwards the Rev. Mr. Hutchinson, of Colmonel, visited Ulster; and the Rev. John Livingston again came over, in company with commissioners, consisting of the Marquis of Argyle,<sup>25</sup> Macdougall of Garthland, and John Kennedy, provost of Ayr, who were sent by the estates of Scotland to confer with the English commissioners respecting the settlement of affairs in Ireland. During the stay of those experienced ministers, the Presbytery had applications on behalf of several young men from Scotland, to receive them on trial with a view to their settlement in Ulster.

overrun and wholly destroyed through the fury of the bloody rebels there; who, taking the advantage of their late success in Ulster, use their utmost endeavours totally to root them out of that kingdom, and do exercise very great cruelties upon them."—Journ., iv., 583. Such were the exaggerated reports of the proceedings of the Irish in Ulster, so busily circulated and so readily believed!

<sup>25</sup> The marquis paid only a hurried visit to Ulster on this occasion. He was suddenly recalled by the Scottish estates, in order to proceed in their name to London, to urge the English Parliament to conclude a peace with the King, then with the Scots at Newcastle. In a speech which the marquis made before a committee of both houses on the 25th of June, he thus describes the privations to which the Scottish army in Ulster were subject:—"As for the army in Ireland, I have been an eyewitness to their sufferings, and so many speak of it likewise upon certain knowledge, that never men have suffered greater hardships who might have been provided. For they have lived many times upon a few beans measured out to them by number, and never had any other drink but water; and when they were in some better condition they had but an Irish peck of rough oats for a whole week. And now, at their best condition, when they are quartered upon the country (which is able to entertain them only for a very short time, they have only an Irish peck of oatmeal, or a shilling in ten days both for meat and drink." See a small pamphlet, entitled, "The Lord Marquess of Argyle's Speech to a Grand Committee of both Houses of Parliament," &c., &c. London, June 27, 1646, pp. 16. It also contains Monro's letter from Carrickfergus, narrating his defeat at Benburb. This pamphlet, with Monro's letter, is reprinted in Rushworth, vi., pp. 298, et seq., and 399.) It may not be uninteresting to subjoin the prices of a few articles of provisions and military stores, taken from the contract of Mr. John Davies, merchant in Carrickfergus, for the supply of the Scots army in Ireland, as printed in the Common's Journals for this year. Oatmeal, at 1½d. per lb., and again at 16s. for 120 lbs.; cheese, at 3¼d. and 3¾d. per lb.; shirts, at 2s. 10d. each; shoes, at 2s. 10d. and 3s. 2d. per pair; boots, at 16s. per pair; iron, at £20 per ton; saddles, with furniture, at 19s. each; English firelock musquets, at 17s. each; and matchlock musquets, at 14s. each.

But they wisely resolved to proceed with caution, and to receive or ordain those only who were adequately recommended, as well as acceptable to the people of the vacant parishes.

"The Presbytery at this time, when expectants were coming from Scotland, made an act that the young men who came over should have sufficient testimonials, should converse with the most judicious and godly in the places they were called unto, and entertain conference with them; and should sometimes preach in other parishes and converse with good people there; that private letters should be written by friends here to ministers and other godly persons in Scotland, concerning their conversation while they were there. Hitherto they had the assistance of worthy men from Scotland; and at this time of Mr. George Hutchinson, and thereafter of Mr. John Livingston, by whose assistance also there was a letter written to the General Assembly of Scotland from the Presbytery, together with a supplication from the country for new supplies of ministers, there being as yet but two in each county settled in parishes. This letter and supplication were sent by a minister and ruling-elder, who were also appointed to inquire for qualified expectants in order to a call from parishes in this country. They were also commissioned to deal with the Assembly for an act of transportability to the ministers who, before the Rebellion, had been settled in this country, and instruments in the planting of the Gospel in it, these being now in Scotland."<sup>26</sup>

The persons deputed to attend this Assembly were the Rev. Mr. Ferguson, of Antrim, and, as ruling-elder, "Mr. John Edmonstone, of Ballybantrim, in Broadisland, near Carrickfergus," a member of a family long distinguished for their benevolence and public spirit, and their warm support of the Presbyterian Church.<sup>27</sup> These commissioners presented their papers to the General Assembly in Edinburgh, on Thursday, the 4th of June, the second day of its meeting. In addition to the usual petition for a further supply of ministers, memorials were submitted from several places, praying the Assembly to permit certain ministers who had formerly held charges in Ireland, but who were now settled in Scotland, to remove to these parishes. The Presbyterians in the counties of Donegal and Derry also applied for a second supply of ministers; but owing to the press of business before the Assembly, their application was remitted to the commission of the Church, to whom power was given to "loose any three ministers whom they shall seek and the commission shall find fit for that employment, and to advise them whom they shall loose to follow and embrace a calling in that kingdom, all parties interested being first heard and their interests considered."<sup>28</sup>

The result of these applications to the Assembly were com-

Robert Adair, of Ballymena (of whom see Vol. I., p. 234) whose daughter became the wife of the Rev. Patrick Adair, minister at Cairncastle, mentioned in the latter part of this chapter; the other was married, first to John Dalway, of Bellahill, Esq., and secondly to Captain, afterwards Colonel, James Wallace, already noticed as an officer in Argyle's regiment, and a faithful elder of the Presbyterian Church. The Edmonstone family resided long at Red-Hall, in Broadisland, where they set an example of piety, condescension, charity, and usefulness, which rendered them universally beloved, and caused their removal to be felt as a public loss. In 1780, the then Sir Archibald Edmonstone, Bart., sold his estate in Broadisland to Mr. Ker, and the family withdrew shortly after from Ireland to their original property in Stirlingshire. The present Sir Archibald Edmonstone, Bart., well known in the literary world as a distinguished traveller, on the appearance of the former volume of this work, immediately, and without any solicitation, placed at my disposal several interesting papers relative to the Presbyterian Church in this country which he had found among the family records—an act of kind and considerate attention towards one entirely unknown to him, which, as similar instances rarely occur, deserves to be noticed, and I rejoice in this opportunity of gratefully acknowledging it. Perhaps it may not be uninteresting to add, that the grandson and heir of the first Mr. Edmonstone who came to Ireland, was born deaf and dumb, and in consequence of this calamity, then wholly irremediable, the estate passed to his next brother, Archibald. He is described in the family pedigree as having "great vivacity and quickness of imagination, cheerful, with a strong memory, and handsome in his person. He lived to a great age, and died several years after the Revolution." I find it stated by Mr. Wodrow, the celebrated historian, in the life of his father, who was professor of divinity at Glasgow, that "he was wont to play at chess with that strange, and," adds the historian, "I think, pious person, the dumb Laird of Duntreath."

municated to the Presbytery on the return of their commissioners. "In July, 1646, Mr. Archibald Ferguson, returning from the Assembly of Scotland, reported his diligence, and, among other things given him in commission, stated that the Assembly had declared four ministers transportable from the places they were then in unto Ireland—viz., Messrs. Livingston, Hutcheson, Henderson, and Robert Hamilton—provided their own consent and that of their parishes may be had. Upon this the Presbytery, together with the parishes to which they were here respectively designed—to wit, Newtownards, Carrickfergus, Killileagh, and Islandmagee—did use all means in their power for obtaining them. But all came to nought. For those places and presbyteries would not want them; and the next Assembly, seeing this country beginning to be so likely to be furnished, were not so forward to transport men, but promised the commissioners further supply and expectants. Besides this, the Assembly did recommend the Directory for Worship unto the practice of ministers in this country, which was accordingly, by act of Presbytery, begun. Likewise the commissioners of England at that time sent to the Presbytery some books declaring the way of the parliament in approving the exercise of presbyterial government in England, and desiring the Presbytery here may follow the same way. Unto this the Presbytery returned answer, that they must have more copies, and have time to consider the same. This motion was not further followed by the said commissioners, and therefore did soon vanish. There were some restrictions by the parliament of England put upon ministers in the exercise of government, which did much entrench upon the freedom and fulness of that government committed to his servants, and which the ministers here could not swallow."<sup>29</sup>

These restrictions, which were unpalatable to the Presbytery in Ulster, as well to their brethren in England and

Scotland, consisted principally in the erection of lay courts of appeal from the decisions of the ecclesiastical courts, which would have brought the latter into perpetual collision with the civil power, and involved them in irritating litigation in defence of their censures against opulent and obstinate delinquents.<sup>30</sup> In other respects, however, the parliament had concurred, though after many vexatious delays, with the Westminster Assembly in their measures for settling the government of the Church. Prelacy was abolished; the Directory substituted for the Common Prayer-book; the government of the Church by congregational elderships, classes, or presbyteries, provincial synods and national or general assemblies, was established by ordinance; the power of these courts to license, ordain, suspend, or depose ministers, and to pass ecclesiastical censures, was confirmed; elderships were chosen and presbyteries constituted according to law in London and the county palatine of Lancaster; and nothing but the confusions attendant on civil war prevented the same steps being taken in other parts of the kingdom. Still, in the whole of this work of reformation, the Independent and Erastian party contrived to introduce restrictive provisions, which, in addition to the right of appeal to civil courts already mentioned, rendered the new establishment unsettled and unsatisfactory. Thus the General Assembly was prohibited from meeting, except at the times and during the periods prescribed by parliament; the precincts of the court and the residences of peers were exempt from ecclesiastical cognisance, and their inmates consequently freed from ecclesiastical censures; it was provided that two ruling-elders at least, but if requisite four, should sit in each court for one minister, and the sentences of the higher courts, to be valid in law, required the votes of elders to be double those of ministers; no person could be suspended from privileges except for certain offences so distinctly enumerated as to restrict the power of the church court; and all the ordinances relative to ecclesiastical affairs were passed for a very limited period only, some for one year, others for three. On one other point, on the subject of religion, the parliament and the Assembly were at variance. The latter were urgent that no public or recognised congregation should be permitted to meet in a parish, save the parochial one established by law; the former hesitated, and at length refused, to concur in any such coercive enactment. In this discrepancy originated the discussions respecting toleration, which were carried on so keenly and for a length of time by the Presbyterians on the one hand, and the sectaries, as they were called, on the other.<sup>31</sup>

<sup>30</sup> The Scottish commissioners urged the following reasons against this obnoxious enactment shortly after it had passed the parliament:—"We agree to the rules and direction concerning suspension from the sacrament of the Lord's Supper in cases of ignorance and scandal: only we desire that the congregational elderships may have power to judge in cases of scandal not enumerated, with liberty to the person grieved to appeal, as in other reformed churches. This we conceive to be a power no more arbitrary in this Church than in them who are limited by the rules expressed in Scripture, and do exercise this their power with such moderation, as is a comfort, help, and strengthening of civil authority. The appointing of provincial commissioners, such as are appointed in the ordinance, will minister occasion to such debates and disputes in this and other churches as will be very unpleasant to parliaments and civil powers; will make a great disconformity betwixt this and other churches, and a present rent and division in this Church; is such a mixture in church-government as hath not been heard of in any church before this time may prove a foundation of a new Episcopacy, or of a high commission; and the work may be better done by the assemblies of ministers and ruling elders, who have this in their ecclesiastical charge, and will be no less tender of the honour of parliament by whose laws they live and are protected, and as able and willing to give just satisfaction to the people whose consciences and conversation are best known unto them, as any other persons whatsoever." In another part of the same paper they add—"There be other matters contained in the ordinances, as, the manner of subordination of the assemblies of the Church to the parliament, so much subject to mistake; the seeming exemption of some sorts of persons from the just censures of the Church; the ministering the sacrament to some persons against the conscience of the ministry and eldership; concerning public repentance to be only before the elderships; and such like, which may be taken into consideration, and with small labour and alteration be determined to the great satisfaction of many."—Rushworth, vi., 254, 255.

<sup>31</sup> Intolerance was the vice of this age, from which no party were wholly free. The idea of several differing churches existing contemporaneously within the same parish, or the same kingdom, was so foreign to the prevalent modes of thinking in those days, and to the generally received views of the precedent afforded by the Jewish theocracy, that it appeared to carry its own refutation along with it, and to be as opposed to sound policy as to the Word of God. The veil which had been originally fabricated by papal policy long withheld the eyes of Protestants from discerning the truth of Scripture on this subject, now almost universally recognised as so obvious and unquestionable. Necessity

As not unfrequently happens in such cases, both parties were, in the heat of controversy, hurried into extreme and indefensible opinions; and the Presbyterians in particular, from their dread of anarchy and licentiousness, excited by the wild blasphemies so confidently vented in those days, advocated measures and employed arguments which have been long condemned and disclaimed by their successors, and in some cases by the controversialists themselves, when they reflected on the consequences of the doctrines which they had incautiously advanced.<sup>32</sup>

These discussions had not as yet extended to Ulster, where the Presbytery were occupied, unmolested by sectaries, in the erection of elderships or sessions, the maintenance of discipline, and the trials and ordinations of ministers in the numerous congregations under their care. Four of the more important of these unsettled parishes were endeavouring, as already noticed, to obtain experienced ministers from Scotland. Encouraged by the favourable answer of the last General Assembly, two congregations in Down—to wit, Killileagh, where Lord Claneboy resided, and Newtownards, not far from the residence of Lord Montgomery—resolved to prosecute their calls before the Scottish Presbyteries for the Rev. Hugh Henderson, minister of Dalry, in Ayrshire, and the Rev. John Livingston, then minister at Stranraer. In conjunction with these congregations, two others in Antrim, Carrickfergus, the residence and head-quarters of Monro, and Islandmagee, the quarters of Lord Lindsay's regiment, applied respectively

perhaps, at first, and the vicissitudes of power—which, by successively throwing each party into the minority, compelled them, whether Romanists, Episcopalians, Presbyterians, or Independents, to become the advocates of toleration—have contributed, fully as much as the justice and excellence of the cause itself, to render it at length triumphant.

<sup>32</sup> Hence originated the unguarded and somewhat ambiguous expressions, on the subject of the magistrate's power, which are to be found in the Westminster Confession of Faith, compiled at this critical period, and which, though controlled in their interpretation by the other sound principles asserted therein, so as to preclude them from bearing a persecuting or Erastian sense, are certainly not such as Presbyterians would now employ.

for the Rev. George Hutchinson, minister of Colmonel, and the Rev. Robert Hamilton, minister at Ballantrae. Petitions were accordingly forwarded to Edinburgh and laid before the first meeting of the commission of the Church in the month of August. Although the Assembly had encouraged the hope that all these ministers might be transported, as the ecclesiastical phrase is, to Ulster, the commission could not be induced to concur. They agreed to send merely another temporary supply of ministers, in terms of the following minute :—"The commissioners of the General Assembly, considering the petitions from Ireland for certain brethren to repair there, for doing ministerial duties in a settled charge of the ministry in some congregations of that kingdom, and finding, in regard of the present condition of this kirk, that they cannot at this time advise any to embrace a settled, constant charge there : therefore, in respect of the present necessities of their brethren in that kingdom, do ordain Mr. John Livingston, Harry Colwart, and George Hutchinson, to repair to the kingdom of Ireland for a visit of three months' time ; and then for that space to perform all ministerial duties for the good of God's kirk there, and to do all and every thing committed and recommended to the brethren sent formerly to that kingdom, hereby authorising them with the same power in all things during the time aforesaid."<sup>33</sup>

In the meantime, several of the congregations succeeded in inducing young men from Scotland to accept their calls ; and in the preparatory trials of these expectants, as they were styled, and in ordaining them to their respective charges, the Presbytery were engaged during the remainder of the year. The first accession which they made to their number proved the most valuable. On the 7th of May, the Rev. PATRICK ADAIR was ordained minister of Cairncastle, a parish lying between Larne and Glenarm, where the family of the Shaws

resided, who were ardently attached to Presbyterianism, and were the means of effecting the settlement of this distinguished minister.<sup>34</sup> Mr. Adair was, for nearly fifty years, one of the most eminent ministers of the Presbyterian Church in Ireland, and “constantly employed by his brethren in all their affairs of moment and intricacy. He was a man of great natural parts and wisdom, eminent piety and exemplary holiness, great ministerial gravity and authority, endued with savory and most edifying gifts for his sacred function, wherein he was laborious, painful, and faithful; was a constant, curious, and accurate observer of all public occurrences; and, with all these rare qualities, had not only the blood and descent, but the spirit and just decorum of a gentleman.”<sup>35</sup> His eminent services and sufferings on behalf of the Church in Ireland will be frequently noticed in subsequent parts of this work.

During the months of August and September, the Rev. THOMAS HALL was ordained to the pastoral charge of Inver, or Larne; the Rev. ROBERT CUNNINGHAM to that of the adjoining district of Broadisland, between Larne and Carrickfergus; and the Rev. ANTHONY SHAW to that of Belfast. The two former ministers continued in their respective charges for nearly half a century;<sup>36</sup> but the latter was permitted to ex-

<sup>34</sup> This family were early settled in Cairncastle, and continued to reside there, in the castle of Ballygelly, till about sixteen years ago, when Mr. Shaw, the heir and sole male representative, who had been a merchant in Belfast, but unfortunate in business, sold the estate and left the country.

<sup>36</sup> Mr. Hall suffered his full share of the painful vicissitudes and privations to which his brethren were subject; he nevertheless continued in his charge at Larne, though his maintenance was scanty and ill paid. I find it reported to the Presbytery in 1674, that “the people of Inver were considerably in arrear with their minister, almost to the half of what was promised him, for these four years past.” He was a most laborious and painstaking minister, and died at Larne in 1695. One of his last employments was revising for the press an explanation, in question and answer, of the Shorter Catechism, to which he prefixed a brief address to the people of his charge, giving them the following interesting account of the origin of the work:—“You know that ever since my entry unto the work of the ministry amongst you, which was in the year 1646, save under persecution, when I was either obliged to leave the kingdom or lurk privately in the place, through the difficulties of the times, catechising was one part of my work; first putting

you to get by heart the Assemblée's Shorter Catechism, and then instructing you in the fundamental principles of our Christian faith by questions raised from the answers of the catechism; following the same method as is here set down both with you and with my own family. And when my children came to have families of their own, I was prevailed with by them to put it in writing for their after use and advantage. Then I came to be opportunely by you and some of my brethren to allow it to be printed, which I could not think of till I had it revised by better hands than my own. Whereupon finding some further clearness, I allowed my son, now residing at Edinburgh, to put it to the press, being the easiest way to make it common; and though now by reason of my age it cannot be expected that I shall see the fruits of it, yet it is a satisfaction to me that I leave this mean of instruction for you." He did not, however, live to see his wish fulfilled, as the work was not printed till 1697, when it was published at Edinburgh, under the directions of his son, Gilbert Hall, "lieutenant of the town of Edinburgh's company of guards." This valuable little work, which will not suffer by comparison with any similar work that has appeared either before or since, was entitled, "A Plain and Easy Explication of the Assemblies Shorter Catechism, confirmed with plenty of Scripture Proofs; very useful to all, especially to those of weaker capacity." Edin., 1697, 18mo, pp. 248. Prefixed to it is a recommendation by Dr. Gilbert Rule, principal of the College of Edinburgh, and three other ministers, who speak of Mr. Hall in these flattering terms:—"Our worthy brother, the author of this little book, though he never loved to appear much in the world, yet was known to be a person of solid learning and judgment, and of singular piety; who, as he was indefatigably diligent in ministerial duties among the people of his charge, so he was notably instrumental, with some others of his brethren, for promoting the interest of Christ and the Gospel in that part of the Lord's vineyard where they resided or were called to labour." In exact accordance with this honourable testimony is the inscription on his tombstone at Larne:—"Here restes in the Lord the body of the reverend and great Master Thomas Hall, who continued a very worthy and faithful pastor of this parish, and a considerable pillar and ornament of this Church, for about fifty years: who, though he died anno domini 1695, and of his age 75, yet is most worthy to live in the memory of posterity, to whom he hath left a rare example of faithfulness, gravity, and wisdom, as a minister; of integrity and solid piety, as a Christian; of constancy, as a sufferer in all vicissitudes of times for the truth and simplicity of the Gospel of Christ; and after all, of crowning his great virtues with most admirable humility and modesty; and so lived an eminent blessing to the world, and departed therefrom much desired in it." Of Mr. Robert Cunningham few particulars are known. It does not even appear whether he is the person who was a preacher at St. Johnston, in the Lagan, and was sent to London in 1645, but it is probable he was not. He died in this charge about the year 1697. Though he enjoyed the patronage of the Edmonstone family, yet he appears to have been ill requited by the people of that parish for his "work of the ministry." Only eight years after his ordination, I find the Presbytery complaining so much of the difficulty of securing his maintenance, that they were about to disannex him from that congregation. In July, 1655, however, Colonel Wallace, already noticed, then resident at Red-Hall, is stated to have "given so much satisfaction to Mr. Cunningham for his maintenance in Broadisland, that the Presbytery do not declare him transportable at this time."—MS. Min. Pres.

Not long after these ordinations were completed, another eminent minister was added to the Presbytery by the settlement of the Rev. ANTHONY KENNEDY, in Templepatrick, near Antrim, under the auspices of the Upton family. The entry of his ordination is still extant in the congregational session-book, which has been happily preserved. From this record it appears that he was ordained by the Presbytery on the "penult," or 30th day of October; that four ministers were present, the Rev. Archibald Ferguson, of Antrim, moderator, with the Rev. Messrs. Patrick Adair, of Cairncastle, David Buttle, of Ballymena, and Robert Cunningham, of Broadisland; and that there were also present three expectants, then on second trials before the Presbytery, with a view to their immediate settlement in congregations, to wit, Mr. John Greg, Mr. James Ker, and Mr. Jeremiah O'Quin, who were soon after ordained respectively in Carrickfergus, Ballymoney, and Billey, in the Route. Mr. Kennedy continued at Templepatrick, amid all the vicissitudes of those eventful times, during the long period of fifty-one years;—distinguished throughout life for sincere though unostentatious piety, indefatigable diligence, and the most blameless deportment. He was imprisoned by the Independents when in power, and deposed by the prelatical party so soon as they were restored to their former supremacy. He nevertheless continued among his people, supported principally upon his own resources; but, becoming infirm, he applied to the Presbytery, in the month of February, 1688, to be permitted to demit a charge which he felt himself no longer able conscientiously to fulfil. To induce his brethren to accept his resignation, he assigned the following reasons, which evince at once the magnanimity and faithfulness of this excellent man:—"Whereas, Mr. Anthony Kennedy hath supplicated this meeting that, in consideration of his age, and thereby of his infirmity and weakness of body, whereby he is disabled from any part of his ministerial work, except it be to preach now and then as he is helped, and that he cannot catechise, visit families or sick as were necessary; he now gives up the charge of his present flock, first to Christ, and then to his Presbytery, for their future supply: not that he fears persecution, or danger, or maintenance (though he has spent a good part of his own patrimony in supplying that charge which, if now to the fore, might be comfortable to his posterity); but finding his own weakness disabling him from the needful work of such a charge, and the ingratitude of some who make no conscience to receive the Gospel and subject themselves to it, he now willingly and sincerely demits his charge of the people of Templepatrick: and, in the meantime, till further or better supply be provided, he will allow a third part of his current stipend towards the support of an assistant to himself in the work of the ministry." This arrangement, however, was not carried into effect; and, after surviving the wars of the Revolution, he died on the 11th of December, 1697, and was buried at Templepatrick, where his tombstone still preserves the record of the fidelity and success with which he made "full proof of his ministry."<sup>37</sup>

The next ministers who were ordained were the Rev. JOHN BAIRD, who had been chaplain to the Marquis of Argyle's regi-

ment when stationed in the Route, and who was now settled at Dervock, in the county of Antrim; and the Rev. JOHN GREG, who was ordained to the important charge of Carrickfergus, the parishioners there having at length abandoned the attempt to obtain the settlement of Mr. Hutchinson. The people of Killinchy and Killileagh, however, resolved to persevere still further in their efforts to procure the distinguished ministers for whom they had been applying in Scotland. In the month of December they made another attempt, by sending over Mr. William Weir to the second meeting of the commission of the Church at Edinburgh, to prosecute their respective calls. But that court now altogether refused to loose Mr. Livingston from Stranraer, with a view to his settlement at Newtownards, while they merely noticed the parishioners of Dalry to send in their objections to the petition from Killileagh for the removal of their minister, Mr. Henderson. At the same time, the commission renewed their former order to the Rev. Messrs. Livingston, Colwart, and Hutchinson, forthwith "to repair to Ireland for visiting the distressed Christians there;" and they made an additional order for three other ministers—to wit, the Rev. Messrs. Samuel Row, Alexander Livingston, and Harry Semple—to succeed the former three, so soon as their period of service should be completed.<sup>38</sup>

In all these numerous settlements, the only difficulties which the Presbytery encountered were in the case of two of the young men who had been present at the ordination of Mr. Kennedy at Templepatrick. "The Presbytery were somewhat troubled in settling Mr. James Ker at Ballymoney, and Mr. Jeremiah O'Quin<sup>39</sup> (a native Irishman, bred by Mr. Upton to be a scholar), at Billey; in these two parishes of the Route, where they were called by the plurality of the people, but opposed by some disaffected persons, particularly Mr. Stewart, of Bal-lintony,<sup>40</sup> who had some interest in Ballymoney, and by Mr. Donald M'Neill, in Billey, who with their party did apply themselves to the commissioners from England yet in the country, and appealed to them from the Presbytery. They had given in divers things in a libel against these two expectants anent the unsoundness of somewhat they had delivered in their doctrine. In answer to which, the Presbytery, in the first place, appointed two of their number to go to the commissioners, and inform them of the groundlessness and error of this appeal from a spiritual judicatory to the civil magistrate; and that they presumed the commissioners will not own such proceedings. Unto this the commissioners assented, yet sent this libel to the Presbytery to be examined. This the Presbytery did with all diligence, recommending the examination of it to those of their number who were going to the Route to Mr. John Baird's ordination, where the other party might bring their witnesses. But upon fair trial they found nothing to obstruct the settling of these men, who were accordingly settled."<sup>41</sup>

Several ministers were, about the same time, ordained by the Presbytery in the county of Down. The Rev. THOMAS PEEBLES, chaplain to Lord Eglinton's regiment, was installed at Dundonald; and about the same time, the Rev. GILBERT RAMSAY was ordained to the charge of Bangor, and the Rev. JAMES GORDON to that of Comber.<sup>42</sup> In the county of

<sup>42</sup> Mr. PEEBLES died in the charge of Dundonald, then including Holywood, in the end of the year 1670. Mr. RAMSAY was recommended to the people of Bangor by the Rev. Robert Blair, their former minister. His meeting-house was demolished in 1669, by the order of the Lady Clanbrassil, widow of the second Lord Clanboy, and first Lord Clanbrassil,* which indignity he did not long survive, as he died in the month of August in the following year. Mr. GORDON, after having been deposed with the rest of his brethren in 1661, continued to officiate privately at Comber for many years; but about the year 1683, in his old age, he appears to have deserted his principles and conformed to prelacy.

[* Dr. Reid has here made a slight mistake. The order for the demolition of the meeting-house proceeded, not from Anne, widow of the first Earl of Clanbrassil—a lady much respected for "virtue and piety"—but from Alice, wife of the second Earl of Clanbrassil—a woman of a very different character. See "The Hamilton Manuscripts," by T. K. Lowry, Esq., LL.D., p. 122, note.]

Donegal also, the Presbyterians in several places had succeeded in obtaining settled pastors. The Rev. HUGH CUNNINGHAM, chaplain to Lord Glencairn's regiment, was settled at Ray, or Manorcunningham,* in the Lagan, and the Rev. WILLIAM SEMPLE was soon afterwards ordained at Letterkenny;<sup>43</sup> and, in a few favoured parishes in the counties of Derry and Tyrone, several ministers, whose names cannot now be recovered, were happily planted. At the beginning of the year 1647, there were, in addition to several chaplains of the Scottish regiments, and occasional supplies from Scotland, nearly THIRTY ordained ministers permanently settled in Ulster.

[* The Rev. Hugh Cunningham is said to have had a son, named William, who married Mrs. Porter, a young widow residing at Castle Cooley, Burt. By her he had several children, one of whom, John, was in Captain Forward's troop of horse at the time of the siege of Derry, and was subsequently an elder of Burt congregation. He died about 1732. Richard Cunningham, Esq., of Castle Cooley, Burt, is his lineal descendant.]

<sup>43</sup> Mr. CUNNINGHAM was deposed in 1661 by Leslie, bishop of Raphoe, but I cannot ascertain what afterwards became of him. His successor, the Rev. Robert Campbell, was ordained to this parish in 1671. Prior to the ordination of the Rev. WILLIAM SEMPLE, I find a Rev. Andrew Semple was minister at Letterkenny, who, in 1642, was served heir to his brother, Robert Semple of Nether-Walkingshaw, near Glasgow (see Inq. Gen. 1695), whom he had not long survived. The Rev. William Semple continued in this parish till his death in the month of October, 1674.

IMMEDIATELY after the decisive victory at Benburb, O'Neill joined the nuncio at Kilkenny, and united with him in opposing the peace which Ormond had concluded with the supreme council of the confederate Romanists. The nuncio, at the head of the clergy, pronounced the highest ecclesiastical censures against those who had negotiated with Ormond, under the pretext that in their treaty the interests of the Romish Church had not been properly secured. Supported by the troops of O'Neill, he committed to prison, the members of the supreme council, and substituted other persons, chiefly bishops, in their room ; he placed himself at the head of the new council, and remodelled the army at his pleasure ; and thus did this insolent prelate, with a few servile ecclesiastics, usurp the supreme authority over the greater part of the kingdom, which he laboured to subject to the absolute control of the Pope, in temporal as well as in spiritual matters.<sup>1</sup> One of his first acts in the new office which he had assumed, as "commander-in-chief of all Ireland under the sovereignty of the Pope," was to direct O'Neill to blockade Dublin, whither Ormond had retired. The latter had anticipated this movement ; and aware of his inability, both from the smallness of the garrison and the want of provisions and military stores, to defend the city against the formidable army which O'Neill was leading against him, he sent commissioners to England to inform the parliament of the increased strength of the nuncio's party, and despatched Colonel Arthur Chichester to Ulster to apprise the Scottish and British forces of his hazardous situation, and the preparations which this ultra-Romanist faction were making to besiege Dublin. On the 9th of October, the Scottish officers, to the number of twelve, replied to him from Coleraine, and assured him they were willing to hold correspondence with him, that "we may hereafter," say they, "be known to have one cause and one enemy." At the same time they sent Captain William Cunningham to Dublin, to ascertain more particularly how "his service may be best advanced." On the 24th of the same month, Ormond sent back their messenger with a letter, in which he gratefully acknowledge their communication, and promised to "give them frequent advertisement how the good of his service and their own interest may be most effectually promoted." Together with this letter he drew out certain "Remembrances for Captain William Cunningham," in which he expressed his anxiety that the Scots should send him a reinforcement of men, with a supply of military stores; and, as a special inducement, he engaged to admit them "to use their own form of service, and have their own ministers, and a church assigned to them, saving to the present incumbent his right." He added that if they could not afford to send him the assistance which he required, "then that they should draw forth such a party as may somewhat divert the enemy, in doing of which they cannot fail of such a booty as will recompense the expedition."

<sup>1</sup> In giving to the Pope an account of these transactions, the nuncio thus expressed himself:—"The clergy are masters of the kingdom ! The supreme council, deprived of all authority, is confounded with amazement to see obedience denied them ! All the power and authority of the confederates is devolved on the clergy !"—Nuncio's "Memoirs," fol. 1346, quoted in O'Connor's "Hist. Diss.," part i., p. 205.

In accordance with this suggestion, the English commissioners, Mr Annesley and Colonel Beale, who were still in Ulster, on the 27th of October, despatched a small squadron of about seven hundred dragoons, under the command of Colonel Edward Conway, son of Lord Conway, and Owen O'Connolly, now raised to the rank of a lieutenant-colonel.<sup>2</sup> This party after defeating O'Neill near Clones, ravaging the counties of Monaghan and Cavan, and burning Carrickmacross and several villages, returned, as Ormond had foretold, with a large supply of cattle to their quarters at Lisburn.<sup>3</sup> Four days after <sup>2</sup> In May, 1645, he was serjeant-major to Sir John Clotworthy's regiment, as appears from the vote of the House of Commons of that date, renewing his pension of £200 per annum.—Jour., iv., 150, May 21.

Further particulars of this marauding expedition may be seen in a small pamphlet, entitled, "Exceeding Good News from Ireland; being a perfect relation of the late great overthrow given to the rebels by the forces of Ulster under the command of Colonel Connaway and Lieutenant-Colonel Oconally, with the manner of their routing and defeating them in the counties of Cavan, Monaken, Louth, and Westmeath, taking 1200 cows, 400 horse, 1000 sheep, with all their arms and ammunition," &c. London, Nov. 23, 1646, pp. 6. It is stated that these forces were out only fourteen days, and that, in addition to the booty they had captured, they had burned corn to the amount of £50,000; but these interested accounts of their proceedings are greatly exag-

Captain Cunningham had left Dublin, Sir Francis Willoughby arrived from England with assurances of immediate aid from the parliament, by way of Chester; but Ormond, preferring a coalition with the Ulster Scots, with whose countrymen the King still sojourned at Newcastle, immediately sent another envoy to the north with more urgent letters, addressed to his "Very loving friends, Colonel Robert Hume, Colonel George Monro, Colonel John Hamilton, Lieutenant-Colonel William Cunningham, and to other the officers commanding regiments in the Scottish army," urgently soliciting a speedy supply of men; and promising, in a private letter to Colonel Monro, "that, though the men expected out of England should arrive, he would, through all hazards, oppose their entrance into the city till he should know the success of this message." The Scottish officers, however, were reluctant to place themselves and their troops under the command of one who had been so recently opposed to them, without more explicit stipulations than those contained in the hurried letters of Ormond. They accordingly wrote to him from Carrickfergus, on the 10th of November, stating the several difficulties and scruples which prevented them from sending him immediate aid; but adding this assurance, "that, those scruples being removed, they would be willing to stretch themselves in the performance of every thing [that] shall be in the power of his Excellency's humble servants."<sup>4</sup>

gerated, and cannot be depended on. It also appears from this pamphlet that the commissioners from the parliament after spending fourteen months in Ireland, returned in safety to London on the 23d of November.

<sup>4</sup> These letters between Ormond and the Scottish officers, quoted in the text, I had copied from a manuscript in the British Museum (Donat. MSS., No. 4819, art. 19, fol. 427, et seq.), but I afterwards found they had been previously printed, though with several inaccuracies in the names of the officers, in Des. Cur. Hib., ii., 392, et seq. The first letter from the Scottish officers at Coleraine, the date of which is omitted in the printed volume, is signed by "Alex. Ker, Ro. Kenedie, S. Hamilton, Achinbreke (i.e., Campbell of Auchinbreck, printed Cachmlrekey), G. Gordon, J. Hamilton, W. Cunningham, T. Dalyell, Ro. Nornbill, J. Montgomery, Geo. Monro, Innerlivir." The second letter from Carrickfergus is signed by "George Monro, G. Gordon, Geo. Barclay, T. Dalyell, Dan. Monro, Sam. Hamikon, Jo. Hamilton, Wm. Cunningham,

Two days before this letter was received by Ormond, five commissioners from the parliament, one of whom was Sir John Clotworthy, of Antrim, arrived in the bay of Dublin, with the promised assistance of men and stores, and immediately commenced negotiations with Ormond for the delivery of the city. These negotiations, after being prolonged during twenty days, terminated unsuccessfully, the conditions proposed by the commissioners being ultimately refused by Ormond.<sup>5</sup> The former, therefore, in the latter end of November, re-embarked the troops, who had been permitted to occupy temporary quarters in the suburbs, and proceeded to Ulster, "where they met with a very cold reception from the Scots. The commissioners themselves were with difficulty admitted into Belfast; but their forces were absolutely refused entrance either into that place or Carrickfergus, and the ships were forced to hover a week about the coast before the men could be landed."<sup>6</sup>

This reluctance on the part of the Scots to admit the parliamentary forces into their garrisons arose, not only from their jealousy of the late proceedings of the parliament, but from a desire to obtain a speedier liquidation of their accumulated arrears of pay. The Scottish army in England were now engaged in negotiations with both houses for their arrears,

An., iii., 301), been recalled, with a considerable part of the army, to oppose the victorious progress of Montrose in Scotland, whence he did not return, except for a short time in the summer of 1646, till after these negotiations. I find him at his head-quarters at Carrickfergus in August, 1647. During his absence, the command devolved on his son-in-law, Colonel George Monro, whose principles inclined him to join with the royalists, and who afterwards became a decided enemy of the Presbyterian party in Ireland.

<sup>5</sup> The several letters which passed between the parties on this occasion are printed in a pamphlet, entitled, "A Collection of all the Papers which passed upon the late Treatie betweene his Excellency James Marques of Ormonde, Lord Lieutenant-Generall of Ireland, on the one parte: and Sir Thomas Wharton, Sir Robert King, Sir John Clotworthy, Sir Robert Meredith, Knights, and Richard Salwey, Esquire, commissioners authorised by the two Houses of Parliament of England, on the other part." prior to their evacuating the garrisons held by them in the north of England, and the sum of four hundred thousand pounds had been already voted by the commons for that purpose. This success encouraged the army in Ireland to make a similar application for their arrears. They had accordingly sent over to London, as their commissioners, Colonel Montgomery, Major Gordon, and Lieutenant-Colonel Borthwick; and they very prudently refused to part with the possession of their garrisons, or admit other forces into them, until the result of their application to parliament should be ascertained.<sup>7</sup> This refusal, however, as well as the private correspondence with Ormond, was most displeasing to both houses in London; while the many enemies, by which the Scots and the Presbyterian party were beset in the commons, took advantage of this circumstance to represent the Scottish army in Ireland as wholly inefficient, as disposed to join with the Irish and Ormond, and as undeserving of compensation for their services. In consequence of these injurious imputations, the officers of the army assembled at Carrickfergus on the 20th of February, 1647, drew up a DECLARATION detailing their proceedings in Ireland, and the unexampled discouragements under which they had been labouring since they left their native kingdom; and vindicating themselves from the charge of inefficiency or indifference towards the interests of the parliament.<sup>8</sup>

In the meantime, they were freed from the unwelcome pre-

<sup>7</sup> This appears from the army's letter to their commissioners at London, dated from Carrickfergus, Dec. 24, 1646, from which the following is an extract:—"Since your departure, there are some English forces landed who desyred Belfast, and have sent unto Scotland for ane order to that purpose. Wherefore the officers of the army did meete, and resolved to keepe Belfast as long as any other guarrison; quhilk we believe will be ane motive to caus the parliament pay us for bygoness, or intertaine us otherwayes as formerlie."—MS. sence of the parliamentary troops, who had been principally quartered in Lecale, in the county of Down.<sup>9</sup> Ormond, unable to effect any satisfactory arrangement with the nuncio's party, with whom he had been negotiating after he had rejected the proposals of the parliament, and finding it impracticable to maintain any longer his position in Dublin, came at length to the determination of surrendering the city to the latter, on the conditions which had been formerly offered. Accordingly, in the beginning of February, he despatched Lieutenant Lee to intimate his resolution to the commissioners in Ulster, who immediately resumed the negotiations; but, fearing this treaty might prove as ineffectual as the former one, they required him to send four hostages to England, as a security for the strict fulfilment of its conditions. With this preliminary stipulation Ormond complied, and sent over to Chester his second son, with three other persons of rank, one of whom was his steady friend, Colonel Arthur Chichester, of Belfast. So soon as these hostages arrived in England, the parliamentary forces in Ulster marched to Dublin, into which they were admitted in the month of March, and were soon after followed by additional troops from the sister kingdom. New commissioners, including two only of those previously employed, were appointed by parliament for concluding the treaty with Ormond.<sup>10</sup> They reached Dublin on the 7th of June, and twelve days afterwards the treaty was formally signed and rati-

<sup>10</sup> The commissioners who first negotiated with Ormond were Sir Robert King, Sir Robert Meredith, Sir John Clotworthy, Sir Thomas Wharton, and Richard Salway, Esq. The last commission included only the two former; and in room of Clotworthy, Wharton, and Salway, were appointed Mr. Arthur Annesley, formerly a commissioner to Ulster, Colonel Moore, and Colonel Jones. Sir John Clotworthy was first appointed on the 1st of October, 1646, and discharged from the commission on the 28th of January following.—Com. Journ., iv., 679, 689, &c.

fied; but possession of the castle was not surrendered until the 28th of July, when Ormond delivered up the regalia and retired to England.<sup>11</sup>

One of the first acts of these commissioners, who, as a body were decidedly attached to the Independent party and hostile to the Scots, was to prohibit the use of the Book of Common Prayer, and to require the Directory for Worship to be followed by all the ministers of the city. The Episcopal clergy, who had resorted in considerable numbers to Dublin while occupied by Ormond, protested against this order, and presented a respectful remonstrance to the commissioners, but without success. The Directory was adopted in all the churches of the city; but in the chapel of Trinity College, which was then in the suburbs, the Book of Common Prayer continued to be used for some time longer.<sup>12</sup>

The parliament, immediately after the occupation of the metropolis by their troops, took measures for effecting the removal of the Scottish forces out of Ulster. In the month of March, the commons had passed an ordinance for that purpose;<sup>13</sup> and, on the 11th of May, they appointed a committee to draw up reasons to secure the concurrence of the lords,<sup>14</sup> who, it appears, were unwilling to entertain the question of the removal of these troops, until, like their fellow-soldiers in England, they should have received compensation for their arrears. In the following month, accordingly, the amount of pay due to

<sup>11</sup> During Ormond's occupation of Dublin, the Irish were preparing, in the latter end of April, to attack the city; but the Ulster forces, at his request, marched towards Leinster, "with ten dayes meale on their backs," and fell upon the Irish, who were mustering their forces at Carrickmacross, and put them to flight. See a tract, dated from Belfast, May 10, 1647, entitled, "Exceeding Good News from Ireland; being a perfect relation of the relieving of the city of Dublin by the regiments belonging to Sir John Clotworthy, Colonel Hill, and Colonel Conway, who fell upon the rebels at Carrickmacrosse in Leinster, putting them all to flight," &c. those regiments who had served in Ulster since the year 1642 was settled by commissioners from the parliament, together with the officers who had been sent over by the army. These arrears were found to amount to upwards of seven hundred thousand pounds;<sup>15</sup> but, though promises of payment were liberally given, not a farthing of this large sum, acknowledged to be justly due, was ever paid.<sup>16</sup> The lords having at length concurred in the ordinance for their removal, both houses, on the 7th of September, drew up a letter "to be sent to the estates of Scotland for the recalling of the Scottish forces out of Ulster, in Ireland, according to the first agreement and treaty for Ireland; there being no further need to continue those forces in that kingdom, the houses resolving to prosecute that war in Ireland with the forces of this kingdom only."<sup>17</sup>

These forces the parliament had already transferred to new commanders. On the 16th of July, they appointed to the command of the British regiments in Ulster, formerly under Monro, the celebrated Colonel George Monck.<sup>18</sup> This adventurer, whose name has justly become a byword for perfidy and dissimulation, had, at the commencement of the civil war, served in Ireland under the orders of the parliament. Returning thence, he became a warm partisan of Charles; but having been taken prisoner at Nantwich, in February, 1644, by the forces of the parliament under Fairfax, he was confined

<sup>16</sup> The arrears of pay due to the British regiments in Ulster from 1642 to the 5th of June, 1649, were paid them in lands secured under the Act of Settlement in 1665.

<sup>17</sup> Rushworth, vii., 803; Journals, v., 294. The Scottish estates, by their letter from Edinburgh of the 27th of the same month, read in the lords on the 7th of October and in the commons on the following day, agreed to the recal of their forces, provided their arrears be previously discharged, and a fortnight's pay, agreeably to the treaty, given to each soldier at his dismission, to carry him home. (Parl. Hist., xvi., 312-314; see also ibid, 488.) Shortly after, both houses sent commissioners to Scotland, one of whose "Instructions" was, to offer to the Scots, "that, if they desire it, commissioners shall be sent into Ulster to state the accounts of the said army; or, if they shall rather desire to agree by way of a general estimate for the whole, that they will then speedily represent that estimate to the two houses of Parliament."—Com. for a considerable time in the Tower. To escape from his imprisonment, he took the Solemn League and Covenant, and, on the 12th of November, 1646, was taken into the service of the parliament. By them he was sent into Ireland with the forces designed for the occupation of Dublin;<sup>19</sup> and having given proof of his fidelity to his new masters, as well as of his courage and address, he was raised to the command of the British in Ulster, with the exception of the regiments at Derry and in the Lagan, which were at the same time placed under Sir Charles Coote. Monck fixed his headquarters at Lisburn; and not long after power was given him, by an ordinance of parliament, to execute martial law within his quarters.<sup>20</sup> This appointment was obnoxious to the Scots, who viewed with increasing alarm the irregular and unconstitutional proceedings of the English army under Fairfax, in forcibly seizing the King, and carrying him off from Holdenby House, where he had resided since the departure of the Scots; in marching to London, and intimidating both houses of parliament; in impeaching Sir John Clotworthy, and the other leaders of the Presbyterian party in the commons, with a view to their expulsion from the house, and placing the authority of the State in the hands of the Independents. So unpopular, indeed, had the cause of the parliament become at this period in Ireland, that negotiations were privately carried on by the army in Munster under Lord Inchiquin, and that at Dublin under Colonel Jones, with the British and Scots in Ulster, to declare for "the King, Parliament, and Covenant," in opposition to the army of sectaries, who were usurping the supreme power of the State.<sup>21</sup> These designs were defeated by the prudence and vigilance of Cromwell and the other leaders of the ascendant party, but no cordiality existed between the British regiments in Ulster and their new commanders. When Coote took the field in the latter end of November, and marched against the rebels on the confines of Connaught, it was with difficulty he could muster his forces in sufficient number to join with his own and Lord Folliot's troops, lately arrived from England. The regiments under the command of Sir William and Sir Robert Stewart, composing the principal part of the Lagan forces, who were decided Presbyterians and opposed to the sectaries, absolutely refused to march; "and therein," says a correspondent, writing to the commons, "have disobeyed the orders and directions of parliament, which, considered with what else is on foot in Ulster, may give to think that other ale is there brewing than English."<sup>22</sup>

Monck was more successful than Coote in his management of the Presbyterian party in Down and Antrim. He was, indeed, peculiarly well fitted, by his consummate address and duplicity, to watch over and advance the interests of the parliament at this critical juncture. His first care was to conciliate the Presbytery, and to endeavour to assure them, in the face of glaring evidence to the contrary, of the unabated attachment of both houses to the Presbyterian government, and of their constant adherence to the Covenant.

with the proceedings of the commons thereon. The Presbytery, ever vigilant for the interests of the Church, were jealous of this correspondence between the Scottish army and the parliamentary generals in the south, lest it might lead to the establishment of Independence. This jealousy induced Monro to write the following circular letter:—

"To the ministers of the severall paroches within the Scottish armies quarters;—

"REVEREND SIR, I, with the officers entrusted from the several regiments, having taken to our consideration the mistakes that has beene and may be conceived of our proceedings, by the ministers and the people of this country, thought it expedient to desyre you to be confident that all our resolutions shall be such as shall no way tend to the prejudice of Religion, Covenant, or what else as good Christians we are tyed to; and therefore wishes you would be pleased publiclie to assuir all these of your people who have intertained jealousies of feares of this nature, that the armies good intentions may no farther be mistaken after this sort; and so recommending you to God, I rest your affectionat friend,

"ROBERT MONRO.

During the whole of this year, no event of any interest had occurred in the history of the Church in Ulster. The Presbytery steadily pursued the same unwearied course of pastoral labours in their own congregations, of visiting vacant parishes, and encouraging them to call suitable ministers, and maintaining the same faithful discipline, over both themselves and their people, by which they had been already distinguished. "The work of God did, this year 1647, get good footing in the country, and was not retarded by the late stroke on the Irish and British forces at Benburb. But thereby God's hand of mercy was seen in preserving His poor people and promoting His begun work; as well as His justice in punishing profane men and a secure country by barbarous enemies. Ministers continued to be planted; and when these could not be had at first in congregations, sessions were erected by the Presbytery's concurrence, ministers and expectants being usually sent to congregations destitute of ministers, to stir up and prepare congregations for planting ministers among them: whereby the young ministers were sent to other places frequently, beside the constant charge of their own congregations. Where ministers were, communions continued to be observed, where the Lord was pleased to give His presence and help to young beginners. However the Presbytery, according to the laudable custom of other Presbyteries, did make an act that, once or twice a year, the members of the Presbytery undergo an admonition or censure of their brethren, if need require it, as to any part of their carriage, whether in the Presbytery or otherwise, or in the discharge of their ministry, known to any of their brethren. And for that end, one or two at once were removed till the rest considered what grounds there were to admonish, censure, or encourage them; and thus by degrees to be removed, and their carriage considered by the rest, till the whole members, especially the ministers, receive the mind of the rest. This was thought a fit means for keeping the brethren more watchful in their conversing, both with their brethren and their congregations and otherwise ; as well as to keep up the authority of Presbytery over particular brethren."<sup>23</sup>

No sooner had Monck and Coote been settled in command of the British at Lisburn and Derry than the Presbytery sought their concurrence to assist in providing the parishes within their respective quarters with a sound and efficient ministry. "At this time Colonel Monck, commander-in-chief of the British forces in Ulster, kept a fair correspondence with the Presbytery, assenting to what desires they proposed to him for keeping discipline in force over scandalous ministers and persons within his quarters. An instance of this appears in his first letter directed to one of their members, who, by the Presbytery's appointment, had written to him to that effect, which letter is as follows:—"Sir,—Upon the receipt of your letter, I have inquired of the minister here,<sup>24</sup> whether any of these abuses were committed; and he certifieth to me, that there hath not been any done these two years. I have laid an injunction upon him not to permit any such scandalous actions for the future; and if any other minister within my quarters shall either marry any scandalous persons, or christen children that are unlawfully begotten, I will render him up to the justice of the Presbytery to receive censure for his disobedience. This I desire you to acquaint the Presbytery with, there being nothing within my power which may be a means to suppress these scandals but shall be readily performed. Your friend to serve you, George Monck. Lisnegarvey, December 17th, 1647. For his respected friend, Mr. Archibald Ferguson, minister at Antrim.' Upon this letter the Presbytery appointed some of their number to go to Colonel Monck, and give him thanks for his professed zeal, who had the same promises renewed to them. It is to be remembered that General-Major Monro, with the Scotch army, had then a great command and interest in the country; and the said General Monro had evidenced much friendship to the Presbytery for a long time; and it was believed that Colonel Monck, though otherwise principled and inclined, did profess favour to the Presbytery and their proceedings from politic grounds, as appeared thereafter.

<sup>23</sup> These "privy censures," as they were called, from an early period formed a part of the discipline of the Presbyterian Church in Scotland, France, and, I believe, Holland, and continued to be long practised by the presbyteries in Ireland. They were laid aside at the general relaxation of discipline in the last century, but they ought to be revived. The form of procedure therein is thus set down in Stewart of Purdovan's Collections:—"In every Presbytery, at least twice a year, on days for prayer, as should be done in sessions likewise, there ought to be privy censures, whereby each minister is removed by course, and then enquiry is made at the pastors and elders, if there be any known scandal, fault, or negligence in him, that it may be in a brotherly manner censured; after the ministers, the presbytery clerk is to pass these censures likewise.

<sup>24</sup> This person was the Rev Mr. Warr, a minister from England, who had accompanied the parliamentary commissioners in 1645 as chaplain, and who settled at their headquarters at Lisburn.—Carte, i., 538. He appears to have belonged to the Independent party, and not to have joined the Presbytery in their government or discipline.

"The like course was also followed by Sir Charles Coote, president of Connaught, and commander of the British forces about Derry, who at this time wrote to the Presbytery, desiring they would send commissioners of their number to these quarters, to take courses with scandalous ministers, and other persons under scandals, unto whom he would give assistance. Though the Presbytery were not ignorant of the ends and pretences of this politician, yet they made use of the opportunity Providence brought in their way; and did send some of their brethren, ministers, and ruling-elders, persons of knowledge and quality, to these parts, giving them commission to correct abuses there by censuring scandalous and intruding ministers, and to make way for the planting the Gospel in these parts. Accordingly these ministers and elders did, in an orderly way, call before them divers who had been received as ministers in these parts before, and, there being divers scandals proved before and upon them, they were deposed. These were Mr. Robert Barclay for trading in a way inconsistent with the ministry, for cursing and swearing, profaning the Sabbath, intruding on a neighbouring parish, and for frequent drunkenness; Mr. Brown for drunkenness, swearing, and railing against authority; Mr. James Baxter for drunkenness, swearing, baptising and marrying promiscuously, and for railing against the professors of godliness; Mr. Robert Young for known debauchery; Mr. Archibald Glasgow for drunkenness, swearing, and railing against religion; Mr. George Hamilton for tippling, and sometimes inveighing against professors of godliness; and Mr. Major for profaning the Sabbath, and promiscuous baptising, &c., &c. In all which the president did concur with the Presbytery's commission, and a letter of thanks was returned to him for his zeal."<sup>25</sup>

While these commanders were ingratiating themselves with the Presbytery, they did not neglect their military operations against the remnants of the Irish army still hovering upon the confines of Ulster. In February, 1648, Monck despatched Colonel Conway, with a party of horse, towards Cavan, who dispersed O'Neill's forces quartered in that country, and took a considerable booty in horse and sheep.<sup>26</sup> It was at this conjuncture that O'Neill, fearing he might not be able to hold much longer the castle of Cloughouter, in Cavan, in which Lord Montgomery of the Ards had been confined since the battle of Benburb, consented to an exchange of prisoners. During his lordship's tedious captivity, several efforts had been made to effect his release. In the beginning of the preceding year, the Presbytery wrote from Carrickfergus to the commission of the Church of Scotland, met at Edinburgh, in the month of February, 1647, to urge the Scottish Parliament, then sitting, to interfere on his behalf. The commission approving of this object, drew up a petition in his favour, and appointed five of their members—to wit, the Rev. Messrs. Andrew Cant, John Nevey, and James Nasmyth, ministers, with the Lord Craighall, and the Laird of Duddingston, elders,—to present it to the parliament. This petition, containing an honourable testimony to the principles and character of the captive nobleman, and evincing, as it does, the sympathy of the Presbyterian Church, both in Scotland and Ireland, in his distress, and their zealous interference in his favour, is worthy of being inserted at length.<sup>27</sup>

“To the honourable estates of parliament, the humble petition of the commissioners of the General Assembly, humbly sheweth—That it is not unknown to your honours how the Lord-Viscount Montgomerie of Ards, within the kingdom of Ireland, hath, now of a long time, been captive and in bitter bondage with the barbarous and bloody Irishes. We shall not need to put your honours in remembrance that he is your flesh and blood; nor yet how he is of the same body, and in the same bond of the Covenant; only your honours may call to mind, when commissioners were sent from hence to tender the Solemn League and Covenant to your army, how cheerfully he did offer himself, and join in the same, despising all terrors and hazards; and how faithfully and zealously he hath laboured to promote the same, not loving even his life unto death, as most amply and solemnly testified unto us in the late General Assembly, and now again by a letter from the Presbytery of our army within that kingdom; as also how in the day of our distress he offered himself willingly unto our help, and still hath been very helpful and refreshful to our forces there, to the great damage of his estate.

“May it then please your honours in this day of his distress

<sup>27</sup> In inserting this petition in the text, I am also anxious that the reader should, by means of it and the letter given in Vol. I., page 394, Note 17, be clearly informed of the avowed principles of this nobleman, of the intimate relation which subsisted between him and the Presbyterian Church, and of his obligations to its ministers, in order that the subsequent narrative of his bitter opposition to the Presbytery, and their proceedings against him, may be properly understood. It has never been printed before.

to be comfortable to him; and to apply and bestir yourselves in the use of the best means for his relief and subsistence. So shall you encourage others to be forward for God and zealous of the country's good, when the coal that is left shall not be quenched, according to your power and interest; and contribute much to the promoting of the work of reformation there, which is like to be crushed in the birth through want of encouragement."<sup>28</sup>

In pursuance of this application, the Scottish Parliament, before they closed their sittings, wrote to both houses in London, "in behalf of Viscount Montgomery, Lord Ards, colonel of the old Irish establishment, who was taken prisoner last year by the rebels, desiring that his arrears may be paid to him to procure his redemption." Accordingly, on the 7th of April, "the commons voted to refer it to the committee for Ireland to consider if they can find out any way for exchange, and the lords' concurrence was desired herein."<sup>29</sup> These efforts, however, produced no effect during that year, until at length the Irish general, finding his cause declining in Ulster, agreed to exchange Lord Montgomery and his fellow-prisoner, Sir Theophilus Jones, for two of the Romanist party in the custody of Colonel Jones at Dublin—the Earl of Westmeath and Colonel Byrne.<sup>30</sup> This exchange was effected in the latter end of February, after a tedious captivity of twenty months. His lordship, as the compiler of the Montgomery Manuscripts writes, "had a safe conduct, and was received in our frontiers by many British officers and some troops, and convoyed through the county of Armagh to Lisnegarvagh, i.e., the gamester's fort, where his uncle [Sir James Montgomery], with a great train of gentlemen met his lordship, and attended him through Belfast to Carrickfergus, where he made his first visit to the major-general [Monro] and to his lady mother,"<sup>31</sup> the Lady Jean Alexander, who had married the general after the death of her first husband, the second Lord Montgomery.

Immediately after his liberation, he resumed his former command in the army, and, with the rest of the British officers, co-operated willingly with Monck. In the month of March a council of war, which continued for several days, was held at Lisburn, to make arrangements for the campaign of the approaching summer. Colonel Monck was its president, and it was attended by the following officers:—the Right Honourable the Lord of Ards, Colonel Sir James Montgomery, Lieutenant-Colonel Owen O'Connolly, Colonel Edward Conway, Lieutenant-Colonel Keith, Lieutenant-Colonel Frayle, Lieutenant-Colonel Conway, Major George Rawdon, Major James Clotworthy, Captain George Montgomery, Captain Edward Brough [Bruff], Captain Clements, Captain Joseph Hamilton, Captain Hans Hamilton, and Captain Augustin, or Austin. But, though Monck contrived to retain the confidence of these British officers, continual jealousy, which he was at little pains to disguise, existed between him and the Scottish army under Monro. He demanded of the latter the pieces of ordnance which were in Belfast, when they took possession of the town four years before; and used all his efforts to prejudice the country against them, by circulating reports of their maintaining secret correspondence with the Irish rebels. The Scottish officers, justly indignant at these attempts to ruin their reputation, wrote to him from Carrickfergus on the 1st of April, in these strong and decided terms:—"Noble Sir,—We have understood by several officers in this army, that you said, at a meeting with some of our members, there was a correspondence kept up betwixt this army and the Irish, or betwixt some of them and the Irish. Our ingenuity to this cause hath occasioned us to suffer much since we came hither, with untainted reputations, so as we think any man or men of that disposition is not fit to be kept in our army; therefore we desire you will be pleased to let us know upon what grounds you spoke of it, and persuade yourself that, as we will suffer none to be of our number who will meddle in such business, which we totally disallow, so we will not take it well there be a calumny laid upon us all without any reason; and, in hopes that you will give us satisfaction hereof, we remain your humble servants." To this firm but respectful communication they subjoined the following postscript:—"In answer to your desires towards the pieces in Belfast, the resolution of the army is, that they be kept for the service in lieu of two great pieces that were splented before Charlemont, which came from the kingdom of Scotland, for which we are countable."<sup>32</sup>

What satisfaction they received from their wary calumniator cannot now be ascertained. In the latter end of the same month he was obliged to take the field. O'Neill, being probably apprised of this misunderstanding between the British and Scots, resolved to take advantage of their dissensions, and with his troops from Charlemont to make an attack upon the former, posted at Lisburn. "But Colonel Monck," writes a partisan of the parliament, "whose valour and fidelity was ever eminent, having knowledge of their coming, marched with such a party as he could make; and, having laid three hundred horse in ambush, fell with the rest upon their quarters, which gave them a hot alarm, many being suddenly slain. They drawing together to oppose the first, were charged by the three hundred, totally routed, between five hundred and a thousand slain, all their arms and baggage taken, the residue flying several ways.”<sup>33</sup>

Monck’s attention was soon after directed to other matters, by the unhappy dissensions which had, in the meantime, occurred between the Scottish and English Parliaments, and which were felt even in Ulster.

In the beginning of the previous year, the Scottish army, having received compensation from parliament for their services in England, evacuated their garrisons and returned to their native kingdom. Their last act was, on the 30th of January, 1647, to place the King—who had resided in their quarters from the preceding May, and had refused to concur in their proposals for peace—in the hands of commissioners from both houses of parliament. This memorable proceeding, which, from the King’s obstinacy, was wholly unavoidable on their part, and which was never designed nor expected to be so prejudicial to his cause as it subsequently proved, has been long perverted into a proverbial reproach against both the Scottish nation and the whole Presbyterian body, as if it had been a base desertion of their sovereign, and a disgraceful bartering of his person for gold. “The fact is this, their situation was so peculiar that they could neither retain nor relinquish the possession of his person without incurring the imputation of treachery to the parliament, or of disloyalty to the King. To the parliament, at least, they were steadfast in their engagements; and their repeated offers, renewed even at the period of their departure, to undertake his defence on the only terms consistent with their original compact, their religious principles, or their political interests, should absolve them from the charge of having sold their King, or retained his person as a pledge to extort their arrears.”<sup>34</sup>

<sup>33</sup> Rushworth, vii., 1109. The same correspondent adds—“Corn is in all the rebels’ quarters at eight pound a quarter, or at twenty shillings an English bushel: the people die within, and the cattle without, and many thousands of both are like to perish.”

The war being now terminated, and the Scots withdrawn, the first care of the parliament was to disband their army under Fairfax and Cromwell, and employ a portion of it in prosecuting the war in Ireland. The army, however, flushed with the success which had crowned their arms, instead of complying with the orders of both houses to that effect, commenced, by means of menacing petitions and other tumultuous proceedings, to intimidate the parliament; and, backed by the Independent party in the commons, became in effect masters of the kingdom. They then seized the person of the King in the month of June; and, to overawe the parliament more effectually, they marched towards the metropolis. The Presbyterians being still a formidable minority, and resolutely opposed to the usurpations of the army, the latter, by a bold manœuvre—the impeachment of eleven of the most distinguished Presbyterian members of the commons, among whom Sir John Clotworthy was one—succeeded in removing these able statesmen from the house, and, by thus depriving the Presbyterian party of possible with discussions not immediately connected with the principal object of the work, and as many of my readers, who have not access to historical publications, may wish to see this matter more fully explained, I subjoin the following observations from the latest work which embraces this period of our national history:—"It unavoidably happened that the treaty for the four hundred thousand pounds to discharge the demands of the Scots and the arrears due to the Scots' army, and the negotiation for delivering up the King's person, went on at the same time, and by corresponding steps; and this, in the ordinary language of history, has been called bartering the King's person for gold. Both measures were just. The Scots' army had earned their wages, and could not be disbanded without this supply; and no person who understood the true interests and welfare of Scotland can fail to believe that it would have been madness on the part of the northern nation to have carried the King back with them into their own country, unless he first took the Covenant. By such a step they would have alienated the English Presbyterians as well as the Independents, and have gratified none but the royalists; by such a step they would have become exposed to all the craft and the intrigues of the King and of the Scottish Episcopalians. Charles had proved, in the most demonstrative manner, by his unalterable resistance to every concession required of him by the people of his native land, that his principles and purposes remained the same as they had been at the commencement of the war. The disastrous events of that war had produced no change in his professions and temper: and, towards Scotland at least, he had yielded not a single point. What, then, can be more contrary to the dictates of reason and wisdom than to have required of the Scottish Parliament or the Scottish army to have removed him into their borders, and to have bid defiance to the whole power of England in defence of him who was little else than their professed enemy?"—Godwin, ii., 255, et seq.

their leaders, easily secured a triumphant ascendancy. Meanwhile, complicated negotiations were carried on by Charles, first at his palace of Hampton Court, and afterwards at Carisbrook Castle, in the Isle of Wight, with the three great parties in the State—the army, the parliament, and the Scots. With the latter he was most inclined to coalesce, and, on the 26th of December, he concluded a clandestine treaty with the Scottish commissioners, by which, notwithstanding all his former pleas of conscience, and his repeated protestations and oaths never to consent to even a temporary abolition of prelacy, he bound himself to establish the Presbyterian church-government and worship for three years. To this stipulation, however, was annexed the insidious condition, that, by establishing the Presbyterian government, he “was neither obliged to desire the settling that government, nor to present any bills to that effect.” The commissioners from Scotland, on the other hand, engaged to support Charles against the army and the dominant party in the commons; and, if necessary, to send an adequate force to compel these disloyal opponents to conclude an honourable peace.

This treaty, more generally known by the name of the ENGAGEMENT, was hastily concluded by the Scottish commissioners without due authority from their estates; and was attended with the most disastrous consequences, both to Charles himself and to the kingdom of Scotland. So soon as it was discovered, he was more rigorously confined; the parliament voted they would receive no further addresses from him; “and from that moment he was justly considered as dethroned.” When disclosed to the Scottish Parliament assembled at Edinburgh in the month of March, 1648, it was not only opposed by a formidable minority, headed by the Marquis of Argyle, but was unanimously denounced by the ministers throughout the kingdom as a base desertion of the Covenant, and an unholy alliance with its most bitter opponents. The commission of the Church unanimously declared that the concessions of the King were unsatisfactory ; that no adequate security had been given for the establishment and maintenance of the Presbyterian government ; that the treaty was only calculated to restore to power the prelatical faction, whose first effort would be to overthrow the reformation already accomplished ; and that it was dangerous, both to the Church and the State of Scotland, to unite in such an enterprise with those who had been uniformly hostile to the religious rights and liberties of the nation. The state of parties in Scotland at this period is thus briefly and accurately described by Adair :—"The generality of the parliament being sensible of the King's present case, resolved to enter a new war, and rescue the King's person from that captivity to their utmost hazard ; which the other party would willingly have complied with, and run the same hazard for the King's majesty, if they had found religion secure upon the King's restoration. That was not found to be sufficiently provided for ; but they did foresee, that, if the King should be restored in honour, freedom, and safety (which was the resolution then owned), without security first had for religion, all things would be reduced to their former channel, religion overturned, the ends of the Covenant frustrated, and the godly in the land exposed to greater hazard and persecution than ever before. Wherefore that party in the parliament did protest against the proceedings of the rest, and withdrew. Likewise the commissioners of the Church, having had many debates with commissioners from the parliament, did declare against that ENGAGEMENT against England as unlawful, undertaken without consent of the covenanting party in England, or without any breach made by them against Scotland ; and withal no security for reformation being provided for, but the King left to his liberty as to this matter after his supposed restoration."<sup>35</sup>

In consequence of the uncompromising hostility of the Church, the majority of the Scottish Parliament, led by the Duke of Hamilton, experienced great difficulty in collecting an adequate army, which it was soon found must be sent into England to effect the proposed liberation of the King. The sober and religious part of the people, and many of the most experienced officers, who had fought in England, refused to serve. In this emergency, commissioners were despatched to the Scottish forces in Ulster, to induce them to return and declare for the Engagement; these were the Lord Cochrane, Sir James Macdougall, of Garthland, and Mr. Alexander Crawford, burgess of Linlithgow. Their "instructions" were drawn up by the Parliament on the 10th of May; and letters were sent, not only to General Monro and his officers, but also to Hamilton, Earl of Clanbrassil, Lord Montgomery of the Ards, Sir James Montgomery, Sir Robert Stewart, and the other commanders of the British forces, inviting them to join in the proposed invasion of England, which was set forth as necessary to preserve "his majesty's royal person and authority, and monarchical government in him and his posterity."<sup>36</sup> At the same time, the parliament sent to the Presbytery at Carrickfergus a letter, similar to one which they had already addressed to the several Presbyteries in Scotland, vindicating the course which they had taken on behalf of the King; claiming to themselves the exclusive right of determining the limits of the royal prerogative and the subjects' obedience, as matters in which the Church had no concern; and directing the Presbytery, without presuming to enquire into the lawfulness of their proceedings, to "stir up the people by their preaching and prayers to a cheerful obedience to their orders, and a ready acquiescence in the Engagement."<sup>37</sup>

<sup>37</sup> I had taken a copy of this "Letter to the Presbytery" from the MS. Transactions of the Scottish Army, in the Advocates' Library, with the view of inserting it among the

To counteract this attempt to bring over the Scottish forces, the commission of the Church immediately despatched the Rev. John Livingston, a man of deserved weight and influence in Ulster, to acquaint the Presbytery with the true state of the controversy between the Church and the royal party in the parliament, and prevent their being ensnared into a compliance with the engagement.<sup>38</sup> But, notwithstanding the opposition of the Presbytery and Mr. Livingston, several, though not all, of the Scottish regiments in Ulster readily entered into the views of their parliament.<sup>39</sup> The commissioners," as Burnet writes, "were kindly received by such of the officers as had chief power there; but most unwelcome to a contrary party, who had notice how averse the kirk to which they were addicted had declared themselves from the designs of that parliament. Nevertheless it was quickly agreed to, that about twelve hundred horse and two thousand and one hundred foot should be provided and regimented, and transported to Scotland, to be conducted by Sir George Monro in the quality of a major-general, and to be joyned by the duke's armie."<sup>40</sup>

The army now raised to invade England presented a complete contrast with that which had been levied for a similar purpose four years previously. The officers and soldiers who composed the first Scottish army that marched into England were remarkable for their sober and devout deportment; each regiment was accompanied by its chaplain, and every tent resounded at evening with the voice of prayer and psalmody. The regiments now embodied were notorious for their pro-unpublished papers in the Appendix; but, finding it to be the same with that printed in Burnet's "Memoirs of the Hamiltons" (pp. 348, 349), I have not inserted it.

<sup>39</sup> From the following vote of the commons, on the 24th of July, it appears that several regiments had refused to accede to the engagement:—"That the Lord Marquis of Argyle's and the Earl of Glinkarne's [Glencairn's] regiments, and such other Scotch forces as remain in Ireland, and refuse to go out of the parliament's service, be provided for as the rest of the regiments are that serve the parliament."—Journ., v., 645.

fligacy and contempt of religion ; and, even before their departure for England, they broke out into serious outrages against the ministers and people unfriendly to the engagement.

“This army in Scotland,” writes Adair, “being declared against by the ministers generally, and being levied out of the grossest sort of men, both officers and soldiers, who had least respect to the Covenant and work of reformation, they, during the short time they had before they went to England, became very insolent, and upon the matter the enemies of both ministers and people who had any profession of godliness; not only threatening ministers and people, but committing outrageous actions upon them, even in public congregations and upon the soberest and most religious sort of people, who they thought did not approve their way. The same were the principles and practices of that part of the army here who were sent for to Scotland to join with them there, breathing out threatenings against the Presbytery and all good people. The Presbytery, being assisted with the reverend and worthy Mr. Livingston, sent from the commission of the Church in Scotland, emitted a warning or Declaration against their proceedings; and the ministers read it from their pulpits, and before that kept public humiliation for preventing that unlawful engagement, and used all other means in their power for that end, both in the counties of Down and of Antrim, as well as in the Lagan, by sending some of their number there to give warning to those of the British army who were inclinable to go to Scotland. This faithfulness and freedom of ministers enraged that party, and made them intolerable in their carriage not only to ministers, but to the country that generally owned the ministers.”

The Presbytery, having thus borne a faithful testimony against the errors and defects in this fatal engagement, so obvious to every constitutional observer, sent over one of their members, the Rev. John Greg, of Carrickfergus, to the General Assembly convened at Edinburgh in the beginning of July. Through this commissioner they expressed their cordial concurrence with their parent-church in opposing this ill-advised attempt to restore the King to the throne; and at the same time they solicited, as on a former occasion, the assistance of an additional supply of ministers.<sup>41</sup> The Assembly once more granted their request, and, owing to the subsequent confusions in the State, for the last time appointed a supply, which on this occasion consisted of the Rev. Alexander Livingston, Henry Semple, Andrew Lauder, and John Dick. These ministers visited Ulster in rotation; and, amid the conflict of political parties, laboured with fidelity and diligence to carry forward the extension of the Church. "In these times there were frequent correspondences between presbyteries in Scotland and the Presbytery in Ireland, anent scandalous persons fled from Scotland hither; and accordingly the Presbytery here did prosecute them here according to the desire of those presbyteries, usually returning them back to Scotland to answer their scandals there. The Presbytery also, upon every necessary occasion, did keep correspondence with Colonel Monck and Sir Charles Coote; and had their fair promises for concurring in settling presbyterial government in their quarters, and restraining irregular ministers of the old Conformists, who acted without subordination to the Presbytery; and also some private men who were venting the errors of Independency and Anabaptism. Colonel Monck's pro-

<sup>41</sup> The minutes of this Assembly have been lost. The Appendix to the Acts for this year contains the following entries, which comprise all the information that can now be obtained of its proceedings in relation to the Church in Ulster:—"Sess. 2. Act concerning the commission from Ireland. Sess. 5. Refer petitions from Ireland for ministers to a committee. Sess. 10. Refer concerning ministers to Ireland to the commission to be appointed for parish affairs. Advice concerning discipline to be used with the garrulous and regiments in Ireland. fessions may appear by the letter returned in answer to divers demands of the Presbytery, as well as those of Sir Charles Coote by his letter. The Presbytery appointed a committee to consider these letters, and what overtures were thought fit to propose to the Presbytery upon the same, with other particulars of moment. This committee consisted of three ministers, viz., Mr. Archibald Ferguson, Mr. Patrick Adair, and Mr. Anthony Shaw, with three elders, viz., Captain Wallace, Captain Eccles, and Mr. James Shaw, of Ballygelly. The committee overtured, first, that two brethren be sent to visit the Lagan; and, secondly, that these brethren declare publickly against Erastianism, then much followed by the parliament of England; they also produced the draft of a letter to Sir Charles Coote; all of which the Presbytery approved. An act, too, was made by the Presbytery, that where ministers are necessitated to be absent from the Presbytery at any time, and a process or any business be depending where they are concerned, that then they give an account by writing in order that such process or business be not retarded by their absence."<sup>42</sup>

In the meantime the Scottish regiments, who had acceded to the engagement, set out for Scotland under the command of Colonel, now Major-General, Sir George Monro. Their passage across the channel was not effected without considerable hazard and trouble. "They met with some danger and difficulty in their transportation, for the parliament of England (apparently fearing by their utter neglect of that army that some such course would be taken by them) sent two men-of-war to guard the passage betwixt Scotland and Ireland, who intercepted about three hundred foot of Dalyell's regiment, whom they disarmed and kept two days, but for want of victuals were willing to dismiss them again."<sup>43</sup> The rest made use of small vessels and the night-time, by which means, and the narrowness of the sea, they arrived all safe (albeit divers were chased) upon the Scottish shore ; and, as they landed in parcels, they were ordered to march straight towards Carlisle," where the main army, under the command of the Duke of Hamilton, had taken up their quarters.<sup>44</sup> This expedition, as ill-conducted as it was ill-advised, was terminated by the battle of Preston, which was fought on the 17th of August. The Scottish forces were entirely defeated, the duke was soon after taken prisoner, and this second civil war happily brought to a speedy close. Its deplorable consequences, however, long distracted both kingdoms. It sealed the fate of Charles, who was thenceforward treated as a convicted traitor, it accelerated the subversion of the monarchy, and it laid the foundation of dissensions in Scotland, which afterwards rendered that kingdom an easy prey to the usurper.

Its unhappy effects extended even to Ulster. The English Parliament, as might be anticipated, were indignant that any of the Scottish forces in Ulster, ostensibly engaged in their service, and clamorous for arrears of pay, should join with their opponents in the invasion of England. Monck, their confidential commander in Ulster, and the intimate friend of Cromwell, participated in this feeling. He had been long desirous to dispossess the Scots of their garrisons in the north ; but, supported as Monro was by the Presbytery and by the people of the province, and still at the head of a considerable force, he did not venture as yet to take so bold a step. The late occurrences, however, were favourable to his long-cherished design. Not only was Monro's military strength considerably weakened by the levies which had gone to England, but, by countenancing the engagement, his credit and influence with the Presbyterian population had greatly decreased. The reckless excesses, too, of Sir George Monro and his party in Scotland, after their defeat at Preston, excited the utmost detestation and alarm, which extended to Ulster, when it was found that he designed to return thither with the most daring and unprincipled of his followers. The Presbyterians were naturally afraid lest his kinsman, Robert Monro, should unite with this terrible scourge of their party, and refuse to protect them against his dreaded exactions. Monck, perceiving that the time had arrived when he might safely prosecute his designs against the Scots, resolved to take advantage of these jealousies and apprehensions; and, as the following narrative shows, he succeeded in effecting his object, and displayed throughout his characteristic duplicity and address:—

“George Munro, after his disbanding, intended to return to this country, together with a profane crew of officers who had followed him, and who had been professed enemies to the ministry and people of God at his departure. The Major-General Robert Munro, his father-in-law, though from his first coming to Ireland he had countenanced the Presbytery, and been in his station very instrumental for promoting presbyterian government in the country; yet he had been consenting to the engagement against England, alleging that he was, by his commission from the parliament of Scotland, bound to answer their demands in disposing of the army or any part of it, according as he was required by their commissioners, which they did then require. Upon this, there was conceived a fear among good people that he would receive and entertain the said George’s adherents in so far as he could advance them again, yet there was no desire in the country or ministers to be rid of him who had been so much their friend. However, Colonel Monk, then commanding the British forces, cunningly fomented jealousies of that nature; and, understanding that Major-General Munro had disoblged one of the Scotch regiments (Glencairn’s) by straitening their quarters; and also the gentlemen who then had considerable interest in these quarters, by forcing the soldiers to oppress the tenants; he did secretly consult with some of the officers of that regiment, especially Captain Brice Cochrane and Major Knox, together with those gentlemen that were concerned in the quarters, in what way the major-general's garrison might be surprised and be removed, withal promising great things to them if they would be instrumental in it. The gentlemen having a grudge at the major-general, and fearing his receiving of George Munro with his associates, and not discerning Monk's policy and what he was driving at, and not foreseeing the prejudice that would thence follow upon the Scotch army in Ireland after their long service and expense of so much blood against the Irish, they resolve to hazard by coming into the garrison by night; and, knowing the gates were carelessly kept in his quarters in Carrickfergus, so that they might, by the help of an ambush without the wall, surprise the soldiers at the north gate, and leave the gate open to a great party under Monk immediately to enter the town; all which they did early in the morning of September the 12th, and surprised the major-general in his bed. Colonel Monk immediately shipped him for England, where he was kept prisoner in the Tower of London for several, some say for five years.<sup>45</sup>

"Thus the major-general was discarded, and the interest of the Scotch army in Ireland easily broken by the inadvertency of a very few Scotchmen gulled by Monk. There was another Scotch gentleman, Sir Robert Adair,* not being upon

<sup>45</sup> When the intelligence of the seizure of Carrickfergus and Belfast was communicated to the commons on the 28th of September, they voted the sum of £500 to be given to Monk "for this extraordinary service;" and directed all the ministers in London and Westminster to return thanks to God on the next Lord's-day, for this great "mercy of surprising the said garrisons, and taking the Scots prisoners." And, on the 4th of October, after Monro had reached London and been committed to the Tower, the sum of £100 was voted to Captain Brough, who had conveyed him from Carrickfergus.—Rushworth, vii., 1277, 1284; Com. the contrivance, but upon this occasion. He then had his residence in Scotland; but having a considerable estate in this country, and withal a troop of horse given him by the King at the Rebellion, which was now under the command of Colonel Monk. He had come upon his occasions to Ireland, and after he had ordered his affairs, he was returning back as far as Belfast at that very time when these gentlemen were upon this project. He got strict orders from Colonel Monk to return to his troop for some special service; and so returning and consulting in a council of war anent the business, though he declared his dislike of the design, especially carried on in that way; yet the authority of his commander forced him to enter the town with the rest, and in person to go to the major-general's lodging and apprehend him. This gentleman having been of unspotted carriage, and in great esteem in his station before this time for candour, religion, and many singular qualities, this action did relish worse in his person, though his circumstances in it were not like others concerned. The Presbytery, out of gratitude to the major-general, their old friend and good instrument for promoting of discipline in the country, did much resent this practice in these gentlemen, and particularly in Sir Robert; and did refuse to admit them as members of the Presbytery, though chosen as elders from their respective sessions; but Sir Robert returning shortly after to Scotland, and declaring how he was engaged in that affair, and the grounds upon which he went, had the approbation both of the state of Scotland and commission of the Church, which was certified to the Presbytery by a letter from the commission of the Church. Meantime, as was before mentioned, Colonel Monk countenanced the Presbytery, and sat with it at Lisnegarvy, as their great friend and promoter; but it was the first and last Presbytery that sat in that place."<sup>46</sup>

Thus, without alarming the Presbyterian party in the province, or disclosing his ulterior designs against them, Monck succeeded in wresting from Monro, their former patron, his principal garrison in Ulster. By singular dexterity, he caused the Scots themselves to be the unconscious agents of his hostile projects ; and though he had deprived the Presbyterians of their chief strength and protection, and had laid them as a party defenceless at his feet, yet he had the address to persuade them that he was “their great friend and promoter,” and to cajole them into the belief that they might confide in him even more fully than in Monro !

The possession of Carrickfergus being immediately followed by that of Belfast, Monck published a declaration, as commander-in-chief of the British forces in Ulster, explaining and vindicating his conduct in the seizure of these towns. This paper he required the officers to make known in their respective quarters, and “likewise prayed all pastors and ministers in their churches and parishes to publish the same.” He also wrote letters to the Lords Clanbrassil and Montgomery, Sir James Montgomery, and the other commanders of the old British forces, informing them of his proceedings, and directing them to send two hundred men from each of their regiments, with a fortnight’s provisions, to join him in attacking Coleraine, the only other fortified place which was held by the Scots, and which, during the last six years, had been garrisoned by the regiment of General Leslie. To this peremptory order Lord Montgomery and Sir James Montgomery replied in a joint letter, dated the 17th of September, “wherein they desire to know of Colonel Monck his intentions and reasons of surprising Carrickfergus, and of going against Coleraine, and of making Major-General Monro prisoner ; for seizing the English commander, and that Monck—whose officers had signified their willingness to serve under Monro—had been compelled to act as he did.—Skinner’s “Life of Monk,” chap. iii., § 3 ; Gumble’s ditto, p. 27.

saying those two towns and Belfast were given by the King and parliament as cautionary towns that the Scottish army should receive their arrears of pay, and that the major-general was made commander by them in chief over the British forces in Ulster. To which letter Colonel Monck replies civilly on the 19th of the same month from Carrickfergus, where he kept the said major-general in sure but favourable restraint: and in his said reply, having accepted of his lordship's and Sir James Montgomery's excuse for not urging their commands upon that unwilling required party, (indeed their whole regiments and the Lord Clanbrassil's were extremely averse, and highly stomached at such a march against their countrymen in Coleraine;) he prayed their favourable constructions of the surprise he had made as aforesaid, and promised kind usage to their relations and friends, and to give to themselves satisfactory reasons of his doings. He forthwith marched to Coleraine, and by getting the same (as he said he hoped without bloodshedding), he did complete his business in hand with a total breaking the Scottish army."<sup>47</sup>

Sir Charles Coote, the parliamentary commander at Derry, pursued a similar course against the regiments in that neighbourhood who were favourable to the engagement. Sir Robert Stewart, in particular, had entered warmly into the views of the engagers. From the commencement of the civil war, his regiment had occupied the castle of Culmore, of which he had been appointed governor so early as the year 1638. He had never cordially co-operated with Coote; and, on embracing the Scottish engagement against the parliament, he retired to Culmore, which he kept well fortified, and by means of the artillery in the fort prevented all access to Derry by the sea. He seized some ships sent by the parliament with provisions for the supply of their forces in Derry, and at the same time detained several merchant vessels, "which he would not suffer to pass or traffique with the city, until it was necessitated to grant him advantageous conditions."<sup>48</sup> This interruption of the navigation was exceedingly mortifying to Coote, who encouraged by Monck's success, laid a scheme, in the latter end of October, for treacherously seizing his opponent, whom he was not able openly to attack. Sir Robert, accompanied by Colonel Audley Mervyn, was inveigled to attend a private baptism in the house of a friend in the city of Derry; and, while he was unsuspecting of danger, Coote surrounded the house and made him his prisoner, compelled him to give orders for the surrender of Culmore, and, by the direction of Monck, transmitted both him and Mervyn to London, to be tried by the parliament for their treasonable opposition to its authority.<sup>49</sup> Having thus obtained possession of Culmore, Coote soon after seized upon the castles at Lifford, Derg, and several other places, and speedily reduced that part of the province to subjection to his arms. By these means the parliamentary or Independent party, as opposed both to the Prelatist and the Presbyterians, were, before the end of the year, possessed of all the principal towns and castles in Ulster, with the solitary exception of Charlemont, which the Irish insurgents had occupied without interruption from the first breaking out of the Rebellion.<sup>50</sup>

While the parliamentary commanders were thus extending their authority in Ulster, their companions in arms in England had proceeded to renew their unconstitutional interference with the legislature. During the time in which the army were occupied in repelling the Scottish invasion under Hamilton, the Presbyterians had regained their ascendancy in parliament.<sup>51</sup> The eleven members formerly impeached and

But no sooner had the army terminated the war by their decisive victories, than they commenced their former course of agitation with increased violence. Their leaders no longer disguised their revolutionary projects for the execution of the King, the abolition of the House of Lords, and the establishment of a republic. On the 20th of November the council of officers presented to parliament their celebrated REMONSTRANCE, in which, among many other similar demands, they boldly required that the King should be brought to justice as the "capital cause" of all the evils which had befallen the kingdom. The commons twice adjourned the consideration of this bold remonstrance; and although the army, on the 1st of December, had forcibly removed the King to Hurst Castle, and on the following day, under Fairfax, occupied Whitehall, and the quarters surrounding both houses, the Presbyterian leaders, unawed by these intelligible menaces its ascendancy."—(ii., 70.) But, while we accept this candid and honourable testimony to the character of the Presbyterians as a political party, we may be permitted to ask,—When could they be justly described in any other terms?—They were uniformly and consistently the constitutional party, opposed alike to despotic and democratic measures, the upholders of a limited monarchy, the advocates of reform, not revolution, and the friends of rational liberty.

<sup>52</sup> Sir John Clotworthy was, of course, one of the restored members. Immediately after his impeachment and exclusion by the army, he retired to Holland, but, when within a few miles of Calais, the ship in which he was crossing the channel was taken by a frigate in the service of the parliament, and he was brought back to Dover. He was soon after dismissed, and reached the Continent in safety. A full account of his escape may be found in Cobbett's "State Trials," vol. iv., col. 911. On his restoration to his seat, a difficulty occurred in his case, in consequence of a Mr. Mildmay having been elected member for Malden during his seclusion from parliament. On the 19th of June his case was referred to the committee of privileges, and on the 26th it was voted "that the election of Mr. Mildmay was void, and that Sir John Clotworthy be readmitted a member of the house."—Whitelocke, 314. He enjoyed his seat for only half a year, being one of those who, in the month of December, were again excluded, as stated in the text, by the army under Colonel Pride—an act of violence which has been wittily, though coarsely, called "Pride's purge." On this occasion Sir John was imprisoned, first at the King's Head Inn in the Strand, and afterwards at the Gatehouse in Westminster, where he continued confined nearly three years.

of expulsion, and determined, if possible, to save the constitution from military usurpation, voted the seizure of the King unwarranted; and, after a protracted debate of two days, by a majority of nearly fifty, in a house consisting of above two hundred members, they resolved to continue the treaty then pending between their commissioners and the King for the final settlement of the peace of the empire. Irritated by these votes, the army immediately proceeded to execute their threats. On the following day a military detachment, under the command of Colonel Pride, seized nearly fifty members, all of the Presbyterian party, as they were preparing to enter the house; and on the next day nearly one hundred others were either secured, or denied admittance, or forced to fly from the metropolis.

The commons, thus purged of the Presbyterian members, and reduced to a scanty minority of Independents and other sectaries, appropriately styled the RUMP PARLIAMENT, proceeded to carry into execution the violent projects of their imperious taskmasters—the army. On the 16th of December the King was removed to Windsor, and, after several preliminary steps had been taken, on the 1st of January, 1649, an ordinance for the formal trial of the unhappy monarch was passed by the commons, but, on the following day, was unanimously rejected by the lords, in a house consisting of twelve peers. The commons, however, were not to be diverted from their desperate courses by the opposition of the lords. Accordingly, on the 6th of January, another ordinance of the same import as the former was passed by them in their own name, without reference to the other house of parliament, by which one hundred and thirty-three persons were appointed as commissioners to constitute a high court of justice for the trial of the King. On the 20th, the King appeared for the first time before this extraordinary tribunal of his subjects in Westminster Hall; but, though arraigned on three successive days, he resolutely declined its authority, and refused to plead. Having recorded his refusal, the court proceeded, during the two subsequent days, to take evidence of his appearing in arms and levying war against the parliament and people of England. On the 27th the commissioners sat for the last time, and, having voted him guilty of treason and worthy of death, sentenced him to be beheaded on the third day afterwards. The only State in Europe which, on this emergency, interposed on behalf of Charles was the Presbyterian Republic of the United Provinces ;<sup>53</sup> but, although their offer of mediation was supported by a spirited and faithful remonstrance against the execution of the King, signed by fifty-seven ministers of the Provincial Synod of London, the sentence of the court was carried into effect, and, on the 30th of January, Charles was beheaded at Whitehall, in the forty-ninth year of his age, and the twenty-fourth of his reign.

THE complicated affairs of Ulster, during the year succeeding the death of the King, cannot be clearly understood without a previous knowledge of the several parties who were at this period struggling for power in Ireland. These parties consisted of the two opposing classes of Romanists and Protestants, but each of these was subdivided into distinct factions. There were two Roman Catholic, and not less than three Protestant parties. First were the ultra-Romanists, headed by Glamorgan and the papal nuncio, who would be satisfied with nothing short of the complete ascendancy of their Church, the exclusion of all Protestant influence from Ireland, and the placing of the kingdom under the protection of a Catholic sovereign. Opposed to these bigoted champions for the authority of the Pope were the more moderate Romanists under the Lords Clanricarde, Muskerry, and other Catholic noblemen, who, being jealous of the predominance of foreign influence in the kingdom, were attached to Ormond and the British connexion ; and, in the expectation of ample toleration, were anxious to maintain the monarchy in the person of the King's eldest son. Of the Protestants, the two extreme factions were the prelatical royalists under Ormond, and the republican Independents and other sectaries under Jones and Cromwell, each of which sought and partly obtained the co-operation of the less rigid Romanists in forwarding their respective designs—the one, to restore the hierarchy, and to place Charles the Second on the throne without any limitation of the prerogative;—the other, to destroy all regal authority in the State, and all settled government in the Church, whether under the Episcopalian or Presbyterian form.

The third Protestant party consisted of the PRESBYTERIANS, who had, from the commencement of the civil war, uniformly pursued the same constitutional line of policy—that of upholding an hereditary and limited monarchy, but with adequate securities on the subject of religion. To these principles they still consistently adhered. They concurred with the royalists in condemning the execution of the King, and in maintaining the right of his son to the throne, and with the republicans in opposing the restoration of Prelacy, and the ascendancy of the Romanist party in Ireland; but they differed from the former in proposing to place restrictions on the exercise of the prerogative, and from the latter in upholding the authority of the King and the House of Lords, while they differed from both in adhering to the Covenant, and in seeking to establish

Presbyterian church-government, in opposition both to Prelacy and to Independency. At this critical conjuncture they were among the first to protest against the trial of the King, and to denounce his execution as murder. The royalists and Episcopalians joined, indeed, in this protest, upon their favourite maxims of passive obedience and non-resistance, but it ought to be carefully remembered that the Presbyterians were guided by no such slavish principles.<sup>1</sup> They proceeded on wholly different grounds. They protested against the execution of Charles, not upon the ground of the servile figment that a

king is above law and not amenable to justice; nor upon the unfounded plea that he had not grossly violated the fundamental law of the constitution which he had sworn to uphold; nor yet from opposition to the abstract principle that it is the right of a nation to resist and depose a king, and even proceed to the infliction of death, if absolutely necessary to rescue the liberties of a people from the ruinous grasp of a tyrant. But when the nation, by its legal governors and representatives, the lords and commons in parliament assembled, had freed itself from the yoke of despotism attempted to be imposed upon it, and was able to dictate satisfactory terms of peace and ensure their observance, they conceived it to be a monstrous violation of all liberty and law, and a more arbitrary and dangerous exercise of power than any which could be laid to the charge of the King, for an armed force to expel with violence out of the House of Commons the majority of its members—to abolish the House of Lords by the mere right of the sword—and then to execute the King and wholly alter the frame of the government, in opposition to the overwhelming majority of the nation, who beheld with amazement, but were unable to resist, these tyrannical acts of a military usurpation. “The Presbyterians, without retracting their principles of liberty or designs of reform, and though far from being satisfied with the tardy concessions, or from confidently relying on the promises or good affections of the King to their cause, yet saw the importance of preserving the form of royalty even in the hands of such a King, now humbled, and restricted as he was to be for the future; and that it was more eligible and conducive to the public welfare to accept of what could for the present be obtained, than to run the risk of losing all, or of dissolving all regular government, and introducing general anarchy in the strife of contending parties, and of drenching the land again in blood.”<sup>2</sup>

In conformity with these principles the Presbytery in Ulster, though deprived of the protection of the Scottish army, and surrounded by the anti-monarchical party under Monck and Coote, were not backward in testifying their detestation of the murder of the King, and the overthrow of lawful authority in England. On Thursday, the 15th of February, the earliest day on which they could assemble after the intelligence of the late events had reached Ulster, the Presbytery met at Belfast, and took into their consideration the alarming aspect of public affairs. The result of their deliberations, which were prolonged during several sittings, and accompanied by anxious prayer, was the following REPRESENTATION, which they ordered to be read from all their pulpits, and which must be inserted at length to illustrate their principles and vindicate their subsequent proceedings:—

“A Necessary Representation of the present evils and imminent dangers to religion, laws, and liberties, arising from the late and present practices of the sectarian party in England and their abettors; together with an exhortation to duties relating to the Covenant unto all within our charge, and to all the well-affected within this kingdom. By the Presbytery at Belfast, February the 15th, 1649.<sup>3</sup>

<sup>3</sup> This paper I have printed from the copy in the “Sample of Jet-Black Prelatic Calumny,” &c., which, it is there stated, was taken from the original. It differs in some respects, but not of any great importance, from that printed at the time in London, in a pamphlet, entitled, “A Necessary Examination of a dangerous design and practice against the interest and sovereignty of the nation and commonwealth of England, by the Presbytery at Belfast, in the province of Ulster in Ireland, in their scandalous, malicious, and treasonable libel, by them called, ‘A Necessary Representation of the present and eminent danger to religion, laws, and liberties, &c.’” London, 4to, 1649, pp. 22. This Representation was laid before the parliament in a letter from Monck on the 28th of March. Journ. vi., 175, and on the very same day Milton was employed by the Council of State to write an answer to it, in common with some other papers against the usurpers.—Todd’s Milton, p. 107. This mercenary task he performed in his well-known “Observations,” a few of which I have annexed to the several passages to which they refer. Towards the beginning he makes this general remark:—“Of this Representation, therefore, we can esteem and judge no other than of a slanderous and sedi-

“When we consider the great and many duties which we owe unto God and His people, over whom He hath made us overseers, and for whom we must give an account; and when we behold the laudable examples of the worthy ministers of the province of London, and of the commissioners of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, in their free and faithful testimonies against the insolence of the sectarian party in England; as also considering the dependence of our land upon the kingdom of England, and remembering how, against strong opposition, we were assisted by the Lord the last year in discharge of the like duty, and how the Lord punished the contempt of our warning upon the despisers thereof; we find ourselves as necessitated so the more encouraged to cast in our mite in the treasury, lest our silence should involve us in the guilt of unfaithfulness, and our people in security and neglect of their duties.

“In the discharge of the trust put upon us by God, we would not be looked upon as sowers of sedition, or broachers of national and divisive motions; our record is in heaven that nothing is more hateful to us, or less intended by us; and therefore we shall not fear the malicious and wicked aspersions which we know Satan by his instruments is ready to cast, not only upon us, but on all who sincerely endeavour the advancement of reformation.

“What have been, and now are, the insolent and presumptuous practices of that sectarian army in England, is not unknown to the world. For first, notwithstanding of their specious pretences for religion and liberties, yet their late and present acting being therewith compared, do clearly evidence that they tious libel, sent abroad by a sort of incendiaries to delude and make the better way under the cunning and plausible name of a Presbytery.”—“Milton's Prose Works,” folio, ii., 550. A similar vindication of themselves, by the Presbyterian ministers in and about London, with their names and parishes subjoined, may be seen in the “Harleian Miscellany,” vol. ii., p. 512, ed. of 1744 (57 signatures), drawn up ten days before the King's execution.

love a rough garment to deceive;<sup>4</sup> since they have with a high hand despised the Covenant, which is so strong a foundation to both, while they condemn it with slighting reproaches, calling it a bundle of particular and contrary interests, and a snare to the people; and likewise endeavour to establish by law an universal toleration of all religions, which is an avowed overturning of unity in religion, and so repugnant to the Word of God and the two first articles of the Covenant, which is greater wickedness in them to violate, since many of the chiefest of themselves with their hands lifted up to the Most High God, have sworn and sealed it.

“Moreover, their great dissatisfaction with the settlement of religion, and their further breach of Covenant, doth appear by their strong opposition to Presbyterian government (the hedge and bulwark of religion), while they express their hatred to it more than to the worst of errors, by excluding it under the name of compulsion, while they embrace even Paganism and Judaism in the arms of toleration. Not to speak of their aspersions upon it and the assertors thereof as anti-christian and popish, though they have deeply sworn, in

4 “But if they mean, as more probably their meaning was, that rough garment spoken of in Zech. xiii. 4. we may then behold the pitiful store of learning and theology which these deceivers have thought sufficient to uphold their credit with the people; who, though the rancour that leavens them have somewhat quickened the common drawing of their pulpit elocation, yet for want of stock enough in Scripture phrases to serve the necessary uses of their malice, they are become so liberal as to part freely with their own budge gowns from off their backs, and bestow them on the magistrate as a rough garment to deceive,’ rather than not be furnished with a reproach, though never so improper, never so obvious to be turned upon themselves. So that this ‘rough garment to deceive’ we bring ye once again, grave sirs, into your own vestry, or with Zachary shall not think much to fit it to your own shoulders. To bestow ought in good earnest on the magistrate we know your classic priesthood is too gripple, for ye are always begging; and for this rough gown to deceive we are confident ye cannot spare it. It is your Sunday’s gown, your everyday gown, your only gown, the gown of your faculty, your divining gown; to take it from you were sacrilege. Wear it, therefore, and possess it yourselves, most grave and reverend Carmelites, that all men, both young and old, as we hope they will shortly, may yet better know you and distinguish you by it; and give to your rough gown wherever they meet it, whether in pulpit, classis, or provincial synod, the precedence and the pre-eminence of deceiving.”—Milton, ut supra, PP. 551, 552.

the first article of the Covenant, to maintain the same government as it is in the Church of Scotland, which now they so despitefully blaspheme.

“Again, it’s more than manifest that they seek not the vindication, but extirpation of laws and liberties,<sup>5</sup> as appears by their seizing upon the person of the King, and at their pleasure removing him from place to place, not only without the consent (if we mistake not) but against a direct ordinance of parliament; their violent surprising, imprisoning, and secluding many of the most worthy members of the honourable House of Commons, directly against the declared privilege of parliament, an action certainly without a parallel in any age; and their purposes of abolishing all parliamentary power for the future, and establishing a representative, as they call it, instead thereof.

“Neither hath their fury stopt here, but without rule or example, being but private men, have proceeded to the trial of the King, against both the interest and protestation of the kingdome of Scotland, and the former public declarations of both kingdoms; and (besides their violent haste rejecting any defences) with cruel hands they put him to death, an act so horrible as no history, divine or human, ever had a precedent to the like.<sup>6</sup>

<sup>5</sup> “And here, utterly forgetting to be ministers of the Gospel, they presume to open their mouths, not in the spirit of meekness, as, like dissemblers, they pretend, but with as much devilish malice, impudence, and falsehood as any Irish rebel could have uttered, and from a barbarous nook of Ireland brand us with the extirpation of laws and liberties; things which they seem as little to understand as ought that belongs to good letters or humanity.”—Milton, ut supra, p. 553.

<sup>6</sup> “Their grand accusation is our justice done on the King, which that they may prove to be without rule or example they venture all the credit they have in divine and human history; and by the same desperate boldness detect themselves to be egregious liars and impostors, seeking to abuse the multitude with a show of that gravity and learning which never was their portion. Had their knowledge been equal to the knowledge of any stupid monk or abbot, they would have known at least, though ignorant of all things else, the life and acts of him who first instituted their order; but these blockish presbyters of Claneboy knew not that John Knox, who was the first founder of presbytery in Scotland, taught professedly the doctrine of deposing and of killing kings. But wherefore spend we two such precious things as time and reason upon priests, the most

"These and other detestable insolencies may abundantly convince every unbiassed judgment that the present practices of the sectaries and their abettors do directly overturn the laws and liberties of the kingdom, root out all lawful and supreme magistracy (the just privileges whereof we have sworn to maintain), and introduce a fearful confusion and lawless anarchy.

"The spirit of God by Solomon tells us, that 'a servant to reign' is one of the four things for which the earth is disquieted, and which it cannot bear. We wonder nothing that the earth is disquieted for those things ; but we wonder greatly that the earth can bear them.<sup>7</sup> And albeit the Lord so permit, 'that prodigal mispenders of time and the scarceest owners of reason."—Milton, ut supra, p. 553. This skilful disputant takes care to assume that the execution of the King was the deliberate act of the nation, who could not otherwise secure their liberties against a tyrant, which is the case alluded to by Knox ; whereas it was the act of a mere fraction of the people, a turbulent and daring junto, whose sword had acquired power which they determined to hold in opposition to all settled government.

<sup>7</sup> "What they are for ministers, or how they crept into the fold, whether at the window or through the wall, or who set them there so haughty in the pontifical see of Belfast, we know not ; but this we rather have cause to wonder if the earth can bear this insufferable insolency of upstarts, who from a ground which is not their own, dare send such defiance to the sovereign magistracy of England, by whose authority and in whose right they inhabit there. By their actions we might rather judge them to be a generation of Highland thieves and red shanks, who, being neighbourly admitted, not as the Saxons by merit of their warfare against our enemies, but by the courtesy of England to hold possessions in our province, a country better than their own, have with worse faith than those heathen, proved ungrateful and treacherous guests to their best friends and entertainers."—Milton, ut supra, p. 555. These few quotations furnish a fair sample of the scurrility and overbearing violence, and contempt of the ministerial office, by which the usurping faction and their abettors were characterized. One redeeming passage, however, is worthy of being subjoined. "The covenant enjoins us to endeavour the extirpation first of Popery and Prelacy, then of heresy, schism, and profaneness, and whatsoever shall be found contrary to sound doctrine and the power of godliness. And thus we cease not to do by all effectual and proper means ; but these divines might know that to extirpate all these things can be no work of the civil sword, but of the spiritual, which is the Word of God. No man well in his wits, endeavouring to root up weeds out of his ground, instead of using the spade, will take a mallet or a beetle. Nor doth the covenant any way engage us to extirpate or to prosecute the men, but the heresies and errors in them ; which, we tell these divines and the rest that understand not, belongs chiefly to their own function in the diligent preaching and insisting upon sound doctrine, in the confuting not railing down errors, encountering both in public and private conference, and by the power of truth, not of persecution, subduing these authors of heretical opinions, and lastly in the spiritual execution of church discipline within their own congregations. In all these ways we shall assist them, favour them, and, as far as appertains to us, join with them ; and moreover not tolerate the free exercise of any re-

fools be set in great dignity and the rich sit in low place,'—
 'that servants ride upon horses and princes walk as servants upon the earth;' yet the same wise man saith, 'delight is not seemly for a fool, much less for servants to have rule over princes.'

"When we seriously consider these things, we cannot but declare and manifest our dislike and detestation of such unwarrantable practices, directly subverting our covenant, religion, laws, and liberties; and as watchmen seasonably to warn all the lovers of truth, and the well affected to the Covenant, carefully to avoid compliance with, or not bearing witness against, such horrid insolencies, lest partaking with them in their sins they be also partakers with them in their plagues; therefore in the spirit of meekness we earnestly entreat, and in the authority of Jesus Christ (whose servants we are) charge and obtest all who resolve to adhere unto truth and the Covenant, diligently to observe and conscientiously to perform these following duties :—

"First, that according to our solemn Covenant, every one study more to the power of godliness and personal reformation of themselves and families, because for the great breach of this part of the Covenant God is highly offended with these lands, and justly provoked to permit men to be the instruments of our misery and afflictions.

"Secondly, that every one in their station and calling earnestly contend for the faith which was once delivered to the saints; and seek to have their hearts established with grace, that they be not unstable and wavering, carried about with every wind of doctrine, but that they receive the truth in love, avoiding the company of such as withdraw from and vilify the public ordinances, speak evil of church-government, ligion which shall be found absolutely contrary to sound doctrine or the power of godliness; for the conscience, we must have patience till it be within our verge; and thus doing we shall believe to have kept exactly all that is required from us by the covenant."—Milton, ut supra, p. 552.

invent damnable errors under the specious pretence of a gospel-way and new light, and highly extol the persons and courses of notorious sectaries; lest God give them over to strong delusions (the plague of these times) that they may believe lies and be damned.

“Thirdly, that they would not be drawn by counsel, command, or example, to shake off the ancient and fundamental government of these kingdoms by King and parliament, which we are so deeply engaged to preserve by our solemn Covenant, as they would not be found guilty of the great evil of these times (condemned by the Holy Ghost) the despising of dominion and speaking evil of dignities.

“Fourthly, that they do cordially endeavour the preservation of the union amongst the well-affected in the kingdoms, not being swayed by any national respect, remembering that part of the Covenant, ‘that we shall not suffer ourselves, directly or indirectly, by whatsoever combination, persuasion, or terror, to be divided or withdrawn from this blessed union and conjunction.’ And,

“Finally, albeit there be more present hazard from the power of sectaries (as were from malignants the last year), yet we are not ignorant of the evil purposes of malignants even at this time in all the kingdoms, and particularly in this; and for this cause we exhort every one with equal watchfulness to keep themselves free from associating with such, or from swerving in their judgments to malignant principles; and to avoid all such persons as have been, from the beginning, known opposers of reformation, refusers of the Covenant, combining themselves with Papists and other notorious malignants, especially such who have been chief promoters of the late engagement against England, calumniators of the work of reformation, in imputing the miseries of the present times unto the advancers thereof; and that their just hatred to sectaries incline not their minds to favour malignants, or to think that, because of the power of sectaries, the cause of God needs the more to fear the enmity or to stand in need of the help of malignants."<sup>8</sup>

At the same meeting at which this important document was drawn up, the Presbytery unanimously resolved to renew the Solemn League and Covenant on the Sabbath eight days following, and appointed a fast to be held in the previous week. They also sent a copy of their Representation to Sir Charles Coote, at Derry, with a letter inviting him to join in the Covenant, and unite with them in opposition to the usurped authorities in England; and they despatched the Rev. Anthony Kennedy, of Templepatrick, with a similar letter to Colonel Monck, then at Dundalk. The latter officer, in reply, stated his dissatisfaction with the proceedings of the Presbytery, and entreated them to delay the publication of their paper from the pulpit until his return to the north, when he promised to call a council of war at Lisburn to confer with them. Coote was more explicit in his reply. In the name of the council of war assembled at Derry on the 7th of March, he stated several reasons for declining to concur with the Presbytery, and pointed out the "sad consequences which would unavoidably follow if he should pursue the intention of the Representation," among which the dread of his supplies from England being cut off held the first place.<sup>9</sup> In the meantime, the Presbytery proceeded agreeably to the resolutions adopted. On the last Sabbath of February, the Representation was publicly read in all their churches by the respective ministers, and the Solemn League and Covenant formally renewed by the people; and on the following Sabbath, the same duties were performed in vacant parishes

by the adjoining ministers. "And it was observed," writes Adair, an eyewitness of these events, "that those who before had been no friends to the Covenant, on the King's account, now became very zealous for it, and owned the Representation, notwithstanding it declared against the malignants making new use of that opportunity for preserving the King's interest asserted by the Covenant. But when their other helps were gone, they were glad to take hold of it. Therefore the Lords Claneboy [and Ards, with their officers, did generally, and with great alacrity, renew the Covenant. Yea, they made a show of some reformation for a time, restraining all drinking, swearing, and profane courses, as had been usual among them. They entertained the ministers kindly, and did much simulate strictness; but still with a secret intention to espouse the old quarrel in the person of the young King. Therefore they found it their fittest course to deceive the well-meaning ministers and good people in the country with fair pretences, till once they got themselves formed in power, and some capacity to work their own ends: especially having the Marquess of Ormond then in Ireland with a very considerable body.<sup>10</sup> and having some hopes that Monk would comply with him. In all this the Lord of Ards was the great contriver, director, and pattern in his own carriage; carrying himself so fair and so friendly with the Presbytery, and pretending concurrence in all the ends of the Covenant, as that few doubted his integrity; even while, without, he kept constant correspondence with Ormond, who then commanded the King's forces in Ireland. Meantime the commission of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland sent a letter to the Presbytery to this effect ; not knowing of their renewing of the Covenant, and having heard a good account there of Monk and Coote concurring with the Presbytery.”<sup>11</sup>

So soon as Monck had returned from Dundalk to Lisburn, he resumed correspondence with the Presbytery. This crafty politician saw that he was not yet prepared for coming to an open disagreement with them, or for coercing the sturdy and resolute Presbyterians of Down and Antrim into submission to the present usurpation. He had, therefore, recourse to his usual arts of dissimulation and evasion. During the months of March and April, various papers passed between him and his council of war on the one hand, and the Presbytery and council of the army and country on the other, accompanied by protracted and fruitless negotiations, the detail of which will be best narrated in the words of one of the leading ministers at this period.<sup>12</sup>

“The Presbytery, having renewed the Covenant in their own congregations and those about them who were willing, appointed some of their number to repair to General Monck and the council of war of the British forces at Lisnegarvey, to desire that an order may be given for renewing the Covenant by the army, and in their garrisons. The Presbytery made this proposal in an humble and respectful manner to the chief commander. The general and council of war returned answer by their commissioners, Lieutenant-Colonel Trail and Major Ellis, that they thought it not expedient at this time, seeing it had been sworn before, and was now renewed by the most part of the congregations; and any who had not might do it if they pleased. But they judged it inconvenient to give an order for it; withal reading a protestation that they all resolved to adhere to the ends of the Covenant against all enemies of it. But the Presbytery could not obtain a copy, neither was this protestation subscribed. The Presbytery ordained one of their number to repair to the council of war; and from them to declare their dissatisfaction of the council's answer, and that they ought to renew the Covenant themselves in giving order for it. And because Colonel Monk had promised a council of war to consult of means for securing the country, consisting of some officers from each regiment and some country gentlemen of both counties, the Presbytery appointed their commissioner to remind the general of his promise; and withal they appointed a committee of their own ministers and elders to attend the said council of war, and have their own meetings from time to time in order to the preservation of religion, which accordingly they did.

<sup>11</sup> Adair's MS. The Rev. A. Stewart, of Donaghadee, attended the commission in Edinburgh on behalf of the Presbytery, and by him they sent their letter in reply, dated the 1st of February, 1649.—MS. Min. of Com. of Gen. Ass., p. 150.

<sup>12</sup> Adair's account is corroborated by a letter from Colonel James Wallace, so frequently mentioned in these pages, to the Rev. Robert Douglass, of Edinburgh, Moderator of the General Assembly, which I have inserted in the Appendix, as it furnishes several additional particulars worthy of being preserved.

“Meantime the Presbytery sent two of their number to the Lagan to offer the Covenant to congregations who would take it there; which they accordingly did, and found many very willing, and others not. The commissioners also, being appointed by the Presbytery so to do, proposed the same desires to Sir Charles Coote at Derry which had been made to Colonel Monk anent the Covenant. But he refused, seeing that the Covenant did not now bear sway in England as formerly; and the prevailing party there slighting it, he turned his course another way, and all along complied with the prevailing party. Notwithstanding, the Presbytery from time to time sent down brethren to water these parts, there being very few ministers yet planted there.

“The Presbytery ordered, too, that where any person hath at first spoken against the Covenant or refused it, before they be admitted to it that they be convinced of that scandal, and publicly acknowledge it; and that this be publicly intimated in congregations. Lieutenant-Colonel Cunningham in subscribing the Covenant had this singular condition in Latin—‘Ego G. C. subscribo tantum morali parti hujus fœderis.’ The Presbytery being informed of this limitation judged it scandalous, and ordered the said Lieutenant-Colonel Cunningham to acknowledge his sin and offence publicly before the congregation at Carrickfergus, and that he tear the subscription out of the paper, and subscribe as usual; which accordingly he did. On this, the Presbytery ordained that those who refused to take the Covenant in a due manner shall be declared enemies to it publicly before the congregations where they dwell. The Presbytery having commissioners in the Lagan gave a commission to them, with the few ministers settled there, to meet in a committee with proportionable ruling-elders, to consult of the affairs relating to the Church and Covenant there, and return their diligence to the Presbytery. Withal they direct divers letters to considerable gentlemen in the country, whom they found in any measure favourable to the Covenant and work of God, to encourage and thank them; particularly to Sir Alexander Stewart, a gentleman of great integrity, and fervent for propagating the Gospel interest in these parts.<sup>13</sup> They also wrote to Colonel Saunderson, a sober gentleman,<sup>14</sup> and to others.

“Meantime the Presbytery renewed the commission to their committee to attend the council of war, and give them advice in point of conscience, in order to the securing of the country and of religion therein. And the Presbytery being inquired by their brethren of the committee, what might be the least they would accept from Colonel Monk and the council of war for security of religion; the Presbytery resolved upon these four heads:—First, that the general and council of war subscribe the Covenant, and give orders for the same to those under their command. Secondly, that Colonel Monk take no orders from the prevalent party in England which may not be consistent with the Covenant. Thirdly, that he act nothing of public concernment without a council of war, till there be a free parliament in England. Fourthly, that he give a proportionable quantity of arms and ammunition to every regiment for the defence of religion and the country. These four proposals the committee afterwards made to Colonel Monk; and withal at this time most of the congregations of the country sent some of the most discreet and knowing persons of their number with petitions to Colonel Monk and the council of war to Lisnegarvey much to the same purpose; declaring their sense of God's mercy by their quiet enjoying the Gospel at present; and withal their hazard through enemies on all hands, Irish (many whereof were lately protected and armed), malignants, and sectaries; and desiring the general, the council of war, and the army, would engage in the Covenant and put the country in a posture of defence against the enemies thereof. Unto these petitions from the country and humble desires from the Presbytery, there were some specious arguments given by Monk to comply with the times and circumstances he was in; but so as not to disown the prevailing party in England, nor to secure the ends of the Covenant; although the most part of the council of war would have concurred with these desires as reasonable and religious. Upon this, there were divers messages between the Presbytery and him, with debates in writing; in all which the Presbytery always discovered and showed that in his answers and seeming concessions to their demands he reserved a latitude and evasions to himself; never closely nor cordially complying with the ends at which they were driving, but always keeping himself free to join with whatever party would most prevail.

<sup>13</sup> Sir Alexander Stewart was the eldest son of Sir William Stewart, of whom frequent mention has already been made in these pages. He was a decided Presbyterian, but was, unhappily, killed at the battle of Dunbar, in Scotland, in the following year, leaving one only son, born six weeks after his father's death, who afterwards became the first Baron Stewart of Ranelton and Viscount Mountjoy. (Lodge, ii., 247, 248. See Chapter XVIII., Note 48.) His widow afterwards married Sir Arthur Forbes, the first Lord Granard. His funeral sermon was preached by the Rev. Robert Craghead, of Dublin, and printed in 1714.

"It was not only the Presbytery and their committee who dealt with Colonel Monk in those affairs, but also the officers of the army. He thought to have trepanned them to a declaration on a sudden in a council of war, which (many of them under his command being men of good principles) they did refuse till further consideration and advising with the regiments. Upon this they appointed a meeting of the most considerable officers; by which meeting this declaration was refused, and another drawn up, which, after it was seen by the Presbytery, and some amendments made to it, was appointed.<sup>15</sup> The reasons for rejecting the declaration framed by Monk were—first, because he shifted the renewing of the Covenant, and proposed prosecuting the rebels as the only

"Honourable Sir,

"That we might unanimously declare unto you the mind of the army concerning that declaration sent by you to the several regiments, entitled, 'An act of the council of war, which the general officers, who are there annexed to, have assented to,' we had a meeting here, and do see mean, if this declaration be proposed to us as a trial of our affections. it is altogether unnecessary, we having so great testimony of our sincerity to this service by our long and faithful continuance therein, and our late solemn renewing of the Covenant, whereby we are to oppose all enemies of religion, king, and country. Neither are we satisfied how we can in conscience join in any new association with such as will not cordially renew the Covenant with us, now when our duty to God and man requires it at our hands: of which we have thought it necessary to give you notice by these gentlemen, Mr. John Edmonstone, Captain Hugh Moore, and Captain Henry Jellet, and earnestly to entreat you to give satisfaction to the just desires of the Church, army, and country, for which they are entrusted, that so we may the more heartily join in the public service, and approve ourselves your affectionate humble servants.

present duty; secondly, he mentioned rebels in general terms, not Irish rebels, according to the usual designation, by which term he might mean those who rebel against the present pretended parliament in England, called the Rump; thirdly, because he mentioned nothing of the sectaries in it; fourthly, because he required in it absolute obedience to himself against all such as he should require. And, though he added this condition, 'according to the ends of the Covenant,' yet that binds not him who answers the ends of the Covenant in so lax a sense as to allege that the party in England break it not. The other declaration was framed by the Lord of Ards and the army; and was afterwards somewhat refined and approved by the Presbytery.

"Colonel Monk dealt subtilly to endeavour to engage the officers to his declaration under fair pretences, before the other came to their hand. But the committee of the Presbytery, being then at Belfast, where Colonel Monk had met with the council of war, dealt with the officers in a meeting with them to subscribe first their own declaration before they take into consideration the other proposed by Monk; and gave them these reasons in writing to persuade them so to do:—First, because the subscribing this declaration unites the army unto the ends formerly proposed, against tentation to the contrary which is now carrying on; secondly, every day's delay in declaring against the sectarian party gives advantage to the adversary to work their own designs; thirdly, delay to subscribe will give further ground of jealousy conceived by many in the country that they are but gaining time, and not single in their first profession; fourthly, they have already consulted the committee and the Presbytery in that declaration as to points in conscience and duty, and now to waive it were to declare they have been but mocking; and, fifthly, if this be waived, there is no ground can be given for securing religion."

These efforts of the Presbytery were crowned with success.

The officers of the army and the gentlemen of the country signed their own declaration, which they called "The Declaration of the Army and the Country," and then entered upon the proposed conference with Monck at Belfast. The latter came prepared for defeating the design of the meeting. His first step was to deliver to the council a paper, entitled, "Queries propounded by Colonel Monck to the council of war at Belfast, April 9th, 1649,"<sup>16</sup> and to require their answer to each of them in writing before he would engage to take into consideration the declaration which they offered to him. These queries were—"1. I desire to know what cause you have to distrust me for my faithfulness to the good cause you stand for? 2. Why do you grow upon me dayly by new propositions, and are not satisfied with these which the Presbytery at first propounded, but assume an unlimited power to yourselves? 3. Why do you declare against that prevalent partie in England without order or advice from England, and thereby do in all appearance prejudge the good party oppressed there, by declaring yourselves sooner than they think it seasonable? and yet to suffer malignants in your quarters contrare to order? 4. I desire to know (in regard of our dependence upon England) whom it is that we shall serve for the present?"

To these ensnaring queries, proposed with the view of sowing dissension among his opponents, the council returned to Monck the following paper, entitled. "Answers given in by the counsell of war to Colonell Monck his fore-mentioned queries.—To the first: Nothing can be inferred from our actions implying distrust of you or your faithfulness to the good cause, since we are willing and desirous yet to trust you. To the second : It cannot be thought strange that we have other propositions (besides the presbyteries) in regard of our different relation ; neither do we conceive that adding to our just desire upon new emergencies, can be called an assumed unlimited power. To the third : Albeit when lawfull authority is suppressed, an order be impossible to be obtained ; yet, as we are Christians, our duties to God and lawfull authority tyes us to declare against the publick enemies of our God, such as are now the prevalent partie in England, who have overturned authority from which we might have expected orders. And besides, the protestation of many members of both the houses of parliament, the protestation of the kingdom of Scotland, the representation of the ministry, the apologetical declaration of many thousand citizens in and about the city of London, all against the present prevalent courses of the sectaries, may be unto us in place of a strong advise to joyne with them in declaring against them and disallowing of their proceedings. As also for malignants, you understand, as we conceive, only such who were engaged against England ; none whereof are by us publickly owned, and if any be privately sheltered, when they are discovered, we shall take such course with them as shall be incumbent to us. To the fourth ; As we have hitherto in relation to England served the King and parliament thereof, whose just power, rights, and privileges we are deeply sworn to maintain and defend in our Solemn League and Covenant, so we resolve faithfully and constantly to serve and adhere unto them, though (now for a time) they be violently bereft of the exercise of their just and lawful power."

Together with this firm and well-timed reply, the council of the army submitted five, and that of the country six, propositions of a similar import to those previously adopted by the Presbytery,<sup>17</sup> and urged an immediate answer ; but Monck dexterously evaded their request, begged a delay of a week, which was afterwards extended to a month; and soon after, perceiving nearly all his officers and men opposed to his designs and determined to support the council and Presbytery, he withdrew to his command at Dundalk, and, on the 8th of May, formed an alliance with Owen Roe O'Neill and the Irish, in order to drive Ormond from his position near Dublin; but the royalists under Lord Inchiquin, having subsequently taken Dundalk, Monck retired to England, whence he never returned to Ireland.<sup>18</sup> At the same time that the council of officers were engaged in this fruitless negotiation with Monck, the Presbytery, at their meeting at Belfast on Tuesday, the 10th of April, drew up another public paper, entitled, "A Vindication of the late and present proceedings of the Presbytery; especially of their late Representation, &c.," in which they defended themselves against the charge of having revolted from their allegiance due to the government of England, and repeated their determination never to acknowledge or obey the usurpers of the lawful authority of the kingdom. "We have not been free," say the Presbytery in this Vindication, "from the malice of the evil-affected, whose chief principle being to be time-servers, have reproached us for our avowing steadfastness and press-

<sup>18</sup> On Friday, the 10th of August, Monck made his appearance before the parliament, and was censured by them for his union with O'Neill in the following vote:—"Resolved, &c. That this house doth utterly disapprove of the proceedings of Colonel Monck in the treaty and cessation made between him and Owen Roe O'Neill: And that the innocent blood which hath been shed in Ireland is so fresh in the memory of this house that this house doth detest and abhor the thoughts of any closing with any party of popish rebels there, who have had their hands in shedding that blood: Nevertheless the house, being satisfied that what the said Colonel Monck did therein was in his apprehension, necessary for the preservation of the parliament of England's interest there, the house is content the further consideration thereof, as to him, be laid aside; and shall not, any time hereafter, be called in question."—Com. Journ., vi., 277. See also a pamphlet, entitled, "The True State of the Transactions of Colonel George Monck with Owen Roe Mac Art O'Neal," &c. Lond., 1649, Aug 15, 4to, pp. 15. At the end of this pamphlet is a letter from the Scottish officers in Ulster to Monck, dated from Belfast, May 9, 1649, and signed by three of the persons whose names are given in Note 15, and by the following—Uti Knox, James Shaw, Edward Ellis, John Edmonstone, William Hamilton, and James Clotworthy.

ing the same upon our flocks; and have fastened upon us such uneven designs as was furthest from our thoughts—that we intend nothing but a revolt from the lawful authority of England, and to decline the subjection of this kingdom thereunto. For removing all such groundless calumnies (though our former doctrine, representation, and constant practice might have cleared us abundantly) we do yet profess, before God and the world, our constant resolutions to subject ourselves to the lawful authority of the righteous King and the free parliament of England, and to the lawful commands of such as shall have power from them: and we do acknowledge the interest they have in, and the power they have over, the subjects of this kingdom of Ireland which, by the grace of God, we shall continue to witness in all our practices, and to teach the people under our charge to do the like. And we conceive there can be no better testimony of the reality of our profession than the disclaiming of the present usurped power of sectaries in England; which, against the laws both of God and man, and our solemn Covenant, they have assumed to themselves, whom we are resolved never to obey as the lawful authority of England: And do thereby approve ourselves to be more loyal subjects to that crown than any who, overcome with the temptations of the times, change with every wind, and for fear of usurpers lay aside the prosecution of their duty to their lawful magistrates, contrary to their former vows and professions, and are now so inconsiderate as to return their own charge upon us.”<sup>19</sup>

This paper the members of the Presbytery read from their pulpits on the following Sabbath; and to mark yet more decidedly their adherence to the King, who, in the meantime, had been formally proclaimed in the principal towns,<sup>20</sup> at the same meeting at which they drew up the preceding Vindication, they summoned before them the sovereign of Belfast, who had so far complied with the usurpers as to open his court without the customary mention of the King's name, and publicly censured him for this ill-timed omission.<sup>21</sup>

The council of the army, so soon as they signed and published their DECLARATION, proceeded to arm themselves and their regiments. They chose Lord Montgomery of the Ards to be their general, and took possession of Lisburn, now deserted by Monck. "Upon this occasion the Lord of Ards, and those of his officers who had formerly been no good friends to the work of reformation, and now of late had in appearance joined heartily in the Covenant, and emitted the former declaration for the ends of it; he with them got more room and opportunity to work their designs, which were to bring the army and country here under subjection to the Marquess of Ormond, who was lord-lieutenant in Ireland under the young king, and was carrying on the old design in Ireland which Montrose was intending and engaged to do in Scotland; all at this time by the King's commission. However, as yet their designs did not appear to be against the government. They were only proposing to the Presbytery to send one of their number to the King, as they were about to send one from themselves to his majesty; that both might thus go together to propose the Covenant and the espousing the work of reformation to his majesty, according as the Church and State of Scotland were about doing at the same time by sending commissioners to him. But the Presbytery, as to their part, thought it not expedient to send any from them to the King."

Montgomery, therefore, and the old royalist faction were ostensibly engaged on behalf of the Covenant, and cordially united with the general body of the Presbyterian soldiery in Down and Antrim. The garrisons of Belfast, Carrickfergus, and Coleraine, were occupied by these troops, and placed respectively under the command of Colonel Wallace, Major Ellis, and Colonel Conway; and the Lagan forces, under Sir Alexander Stewart, were also prepared and ready to co-operate in the same cause. The republican party possessed no place of strength in Ulster, save Derry, which was held by Sir Charles Coote, who had resisted the various efforts that had been made to induce him at this crisis to join the Presbyterians. To this important post, therefore, the attention of the army and country was now directed.

"The council of war next sent commissioners from them to those who had renewed the Covenant about Derry, viz., Cunningham, Maxwell, and Moore, advising them to draw their forces to the fields for the ends of the Covenant; as they of Down and Antrim had done before. But Sir Charles Coote, notwithstanding he had been seemingly forward before for the Presbytery, and had concurred with them, and was sworn a ruling-elder in Derry, now finding things going in another channel in England, altogether refused to declare against that party in England, or to give order for renewing the Covenant. Upon this, animosities arose between him and those of the army and country there, who had renewed the Covenant and subscribed the same declaration which was subscribed in Down and Antrim by the council of war. And on this occasion the officers there, who had taken the Covenant and declaration, had drawn together some other forces to the fields, according as they were advised by them. But Sir Charles sent out a party from Derry and Coleraine, and drew together a considerable number of persons at the rendezvous near Derry. Upon which Sir Alexander Stewart marched towards Derry with his regiment and sat down before it. Others, really affected, joined with him, so that the city was surprised and brought to straits."

In the latter end of March occurred the first hostile movement in this blockade, which, though it continued during nearly five months, has been almost forgotten, having been eclipsed by the second, and more celebrated, siege which this "maiden city" afterwards sustained.<sup>22</sup> On the 28th of that month, the Lagan forces took possession of Manorcunningham and Carrigans, and cut off the supplies of the garrison from that quarter. On the 1st of April they drew towards the city, and two days afterwards surprised a convoy commanded by Captain Kilmer, who were conveying thirty bolls of meal from Muff, on the opposite side of the river. Kilmer fled, but on the 7th, he and Captain Finch were taken prisoners. The latter was exchanged for Captain Lawson, whose gallant conduct at the breaking out of the Rebellion has been already noticed, and who had now abandoned the republican authorities in Derry, and joined the Presbyterians. Several unimportant, though not bloodless, skirmishes subsequently took place; but on the 23d of April, Coote, at the head of a large party of dragoons, sallied out and suddenly fell on the quarters of the Lagan forces at Carrigans, who suffered severely in this unexpected attack. Major Balfour and Captain Mather, with twenty men, were slain; and Lieutenant-Colonel James Galbraith, Majors Hamilton and Grahame, Captain John Stewart, with two lieutenants, two ensigns, and above forty men, were taken prisoners, and "a good store of arms and plunder was brought home to the garrison." Thirty of the prisoners were exchanged for the thirty bolls of meal taken by the Presbyterians in the beginning of the month, and the remainder were reserved to be ransomed."<sup>23</sup>

Notwithstanding this advantage, Coote found it necessary to prepare for a closer siege. In the end of April, he ordered the orchards and gardens surrounding the town to be cut down, and the houses and ditches to be levelled; and on the 5th of May the Lagan forces encamped round the city, and threw up entrenchments within cannon-shot. On the 26th they were joined by Sir Robert Stewart and Colonel Mervyn,<sup>24</sup> who had been liberated by the parliament on bail, and who, bringing with them numbers of the old royalists and prelatical faction, sowed dissension among the besiegers, by discountenancing those who were attached to the Covenant, and endeavouring to monopolise the management of the siege. This unhappy schism was widened by the arrival of Sir George Monro, who, forced to abandon Scotland, had returned to Ireland with a party of Scottish Highlanders, and taken a commission from Ormond on behalf of Charles II. A body of the Irish confederates, whom the late peace had united with Ormond, were immediately placed under his command; and at the head of these auxiliaries and his own Highlanders, all of them Roman Catholics and the terror of the country, he marched from Connaught to Derry, and introduced further jealousies among the besiegers.

<sup>23</sup> This skirmish was thought to be of so much importance to the republican cause, that so soon as the account of it reached London, it was printed in a small tract, entitled, "A bloody fight in Ireland, and a great victory obtained by Sir Charles Coote, lord president of Connaught, against the British forces of Lagan, &c." Lond., 1649, July 2, pp. 6. Towards the end it is stated—"The enemy have divided themselves thus, Sir Robert Stewart and Colonel Mervyn with their two regiments, for the greatest part beat a place called Fine (Fahan), to prevent the approach of Sir Charles Coote's Connaught forces in coming for his relief, who lie about Ballishannon.—Monro is now returned into the Lagan, for Sir Robert Stewart's assistance, with his regiments of Highlanders and Irish, whereof his strength consists; and these with their priests are to settle the Protestant reformed religion, the ministry of this country being clapt up close prisoners by them."

<sup>24</sup> A few unimportant skirmishes had occurred before their arrival; one on the 13th of May, on the Strand beyond the gallows, where five of the besiegers were killed; and another on the 15th, in the Bog-side, where six were killed, and several taken prisoners. On the 21st, the convoy sent to Dublin for assistance, captured a boat laden with barley, and a small bark bound for Scotland with cows and horses; and about the same time, a ship arrived from England with five hundred quarters of wheat, and a reinforcement of two hundred men, which enabled Coote to continue the siege without apprehension or risk of famine.

“The old malignant party in the country,” writes Adair, “pretending great affection to the cause, and submitting to the Covenant and declaration, mixed in the leagure, and became a stronger party there than the other commanded by Sir Alexander Stewart. According as the Presbytery had, all those times, supplied the Lagan by commissioners of their own number upon their own charges one or two at a time; so the ministers who had, upon Sir Alexander’s desire, been sent from the Presbytery to join with the few ministers of Lagan in order to further the renewing of the Covenant and entering into the declaration in that country, being invited to preach in the leagure, did comply with the desire for a time, the rather to know how things were going on, and to understand the designs of that party. But a few days discovered to them that the malignant party carried all before them, and that they were generally profane and unconcerned for religion and the ends of the Covenant. The ministers could not in duty but testify this in their preaching; whereupon, though for a little time they were seemingly entertained and consulted with, as the circumstances of that party called for in that juncture, yet within a very little time they were slighted and mocked by the new party who had joined. But Sir Alexander Stewart, with his party, still persisting in his respect for the ministers, put it to them for their advice what was best to be done by them. The ministers saw no grounds for him and his party to continue the leagure, and so declared; not from respect to Coote’s party, but that they saw the old malignant interest carrying on. At this the ministers were yet more discountenanced by the other party; upon which they left off frequenting the leagure; and employed themselves in such places of the country as were destitute of ministers. Therefore divisions grew between the two parties in the leagure; and honest men being put on the hardest pieces of service, divers were killed, and all of them found it hard to continue the siege. Thereafter they acquainted the Lord of Ards with their condition; who with his attendants went to Derry pretending to bring a right understanding between Coote and them. He was received into the town with civility and compliments, and had communication with Coote; but no agreement followed. Therefore he returned that night to the leagure, where being at supper, and having drunk largely in the city, he became more free in his discourse in the audience of one of the ministers of Down, who came thither to take leave with some friends, saying,—‘if Coote would engage for monarchical government in the person of the present King, the devil take him that meddles with religion; let God fight for his own religion himself!’ And indeed, thereafter returning homeward, he in his actings proved the same man he thus professed himself to be. At this time George Monro was fast hastening from Ormond with a band of Irish Papists, who had lately been in rebellion, and joined in this siege of Derry. He brought a letter to Sir Robert Stewart, one of that party and an old malignant, who then used the ministers civilly, desiring him to lay hold on the persons of these ministers as the greatest enemies to their design. This letter being intercepted and presented to a meeting of the ministers, they found it their duty to be on their guard. Those of the Lagan lurked in the country, and those of the Claneboys returned home.”

In the midst of these civil commotions the Presbytery were occupied with an unhappy division among themselves, arising out of their faithful testimony against the murder of the King.

The circumstances of this case are thus narrated by Adair :—
 “ It is fit to remember a troublesome passage the Presbytery had with two of their brethren lately admitted to the ministry, though not young in years ; for whose settling, in opposition to the malignant party, the Presbytery had before had great difficulty.<sup>25</sup> These were James Ker and Jeremiah O’Quin, by birth an Irishman ; both of them men of great reputation for honesty and zeal, though of little learning and no great judgment. When the Presbytery appointed renewing the Covenant and reading the REPRESENTATION, in February before, these brethren, not being then present at the Presbytery, did decline to concur with their brethren in the representation. The next Presbytery, hearing this, they questioned the brethren, and they pretending some reasons for their not reading the representation, the brethren did, divers times and at the meetings of several presbyteries, use all means to satisfy their scruples. But they still persisting in their opinion, and refusing to concur with their brethren in a duty so necessary at that time ; and in discourse, finding they did not absolutely condemn the murder of the King, nor the courses of the sectarian party in England, but, rather, mitigating their practices and putting good construction upon them after they had overturned the foundations of government in Church and State ; the brethren, having waited long on them, at last passed a sentence of suspension on them, and appointed a brother to intimate it in their churches[at Ballymoney and Billey], which was done. But they despised the sentence, and justified themselves to the people they conversed with ; and therein by many they were believed, and the Presbytery condemned and reflected on for severity and rashness. Upon this consideration, and also to inform the commission of the Church in Scotland of the proceedings of the Presbytery in their late actings, the Presbytery sent over Mr. Thomas Hall to the commission of the

Church. The suspended brethren had now, after this, divers applications to the Presbytery for opening their mouths; but, having no sense of their wrong, they were rejected. Yet, when these men had run their course for a time, and concurred a while with the sectaries, after their brethren were lying under their persecution, they at length, having discovered the course that party followed, and that they aimed at temporal dominion rather than religion, and that when they came to the country the greatest malignants were greatest with them, because they could flatter and comply, and that the truly godly, who could not justify their proceedings, were exposed to their hatred, contempt, and persecution, did three years afterwards return to the rest and acknowledge their errors both before the brethren and, as they had occasion, also before the officers or governors of the sectarian party in this country.<sup>26</sup>

<sup>26</sup> The Independent and Republican party, of course, sympathised with these suspended ministers, and declaimed loudly against the conduct of the Presbytery as tyrannical and popish. The several documents connected with the case were afterwards published by them in London, with the view, as is stated in the preface, of showing "the pitiful slavery they lie under where a Presbytery is established." Their pamphlet was entitled, "News from Ireland concerning the proceedings of the Presbytery in the county of Antrim, in Ireland, in several sittings in that county against Mr. James Ker and Mr. Jeremy O'Queen, two of their fellow ministers of the same Presbytery; for their refusing to read that treasonable representation which was by the said Presbytery then at Belfast commanded to be read publicly by all their ministers in February, 1649. Published for the undeceiving of those who (not knowing what they would desire) would have Presbytery established by law in this commonwealth. Printed from the relation made thereof by Mr. James Ker, and by him delivered to Colonel Venables, commander-in-chief of the forces of the commonwealth of England in the counties of Down and Antrim." London, 4to, July 9, 1650, pp. 38. This very rare and curious pamphlet contains a copy of the Presbytery's Representation, together with the following documents, which would otherwise have been irrecoverably lost: 1. Objections given in by Messrs. Ker and O'Quin to the Presbytery sitting at Carrickfergus, May 3, 1649. (2.) The Presbytery's observations upon and answers unto these objections. (3.) Messrs. Ker and O'Quin's reply to the Presbytery's observations. (4.) Mr. Ker's answer to a letter sent him from a friend in Scotland, dated July 13. (5.) Mr. Ker's letter to the commissioners of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, dated from Ballymoney, September 15, 1649. (6.) Petition from the congregation of Ballymoney, praying the Presbytery to restore Mr. Ker. (7.) The confession subscribed by Mr. Ker before the Presbytery sitting at Bangor. I subjoin the first of those documents, that the reader may see the nature of the objections which induced those two brethren so obstinately to oppose the Presbytery. Instead of grappling with the main question of the King's execution, and the overthrow of the monarchy, they had only a few frivolous cavils to urge against the wording of the Representation.

"But to return," continues Adair, "to the account of the party now carrying on their designs against the Covenant with greater boldness. George Monro, leaving the siege of Derry, advanced and surprised Coleraine with his band of Irish [on the 7th of June]. Meantime, the Lord of Ards, having from the beginning of this late rebellion had intercourse with Ormond, and had received a commission from him by order of the King, to command in chief the forces from Ulster, carried on his correspondence with George Monro in private, and endeavoured to engage the Lord Conway to his party; assuring him he would in due time suppress the ministers and discard such officers as were not fit for their purpose. This was made

"Objections given in by the under subscribers to the rev. moderator and remanent brethren of the Presbytery sitting at Carrickfergus, May 3, 1649; which objections occasioned the not reading of the Representation.

"1. In general, many of the assertions therein contained seem to us to be exceeding more hask than beseemeth us, being in number few, young men, and far from true intelligence. 2.) Although we cannot say (as we are informed that the late and present actings of the army in England are without great hazard to religion and liberties, yet we doubt whether we may truly say 'that they love to wear a rough garment to deceive,' as is asserted in the Representation. 3. And forasmuch as we have, neither in writ nor print, seen any public thing set forth by the army wherein they call the Covenant 'a bundle of particular and contrary interests,' and 'a snare to the people,' therefore we desire the truth of that assertion to be proved. (4.) We desire the truth of that made more manifest—viz., that the army is labouring to establish by a law an universal toleration of all religions without exception, yea, even Paganism and Judaism. (5.) If we should read the Representation, we conceive ourselves unable to prove that point which affirms many of the chiefest of the army to be perjured. 6. Neither do we as yet know that the said army doth despitefully blaspheme presbyterial government, and call it and the assertors thereof 'antichristian and popish.' 7. It is a question to us whether these members that were removed were the 'most worthy members' of the honourable House of Commons. 8.) Although it is affirmed that the removing of these members is an action unparalleled in any age, yet the truth of it is doubtful to us. (9.) We cannot affirm that the King was tried by private men, and with cruel hands put to death, because it is a civil question beyond our capacity, which we conceive might abide a dispute in the three kingdoms before it be absolutely determined, as it is now asserted in the Representation. (10.) We could wish that the word 'just hatred' to sectaries were expressed 'just hatred to their evil courses.'

"Mr. JAMES KER.

"Mr. JEREMY O'QUIN."

I am sorry my limits do not warrant my inserting the satisfactory answer of the Presbytery to these cavils. I shall only add, that the commission of the General Assembly approved of the whole of the proceedings of the Presbytery in this case. MS. Min. of Com. of Gen. Ass. known to the Presbytery, and my lord questioned on it; but he denied it all. At this time, also, when the country was alarmed by George Monro and his Irishmen coming over the river Bann, and he making open profession of his intentions, some gentlemen in the country, with the advice of ministers in the county of Antrim, resolved to meet him, with the assistance of some soldiers under the command of Major Clotworthy and Major Ellis, and some of Glencairn's regiment, not thinking, all this time, of his correspondence with the Lord of Ards and his faction. They went as far as Clough, beyond Ballymena; but the soldiers being few, and the country utterly unarmed and untrained, and divers gentlemen there being altogether unwilling to engage; besides that there were some in the company who were set on to weaken the hands of the rest from engaging. And so the wiser sort, seeing nothing but confusion likely to ensue upon this business, some of their number were sent to Monro to know what he would be at. He told them he designed nothing but the restoring of lawful authority, and the opposing of sectaries; and that he would molest none who opposed not him, or were known enemies to it, or friends to the sectaries. Upon the confidence of this, it was resolved by the officers and country gentlemen to return home, which they did.

“The Presbytery now began to be more jealous of the late reformers, and particularly of the Lord of Ards. Therefore they appointed a committee to meet frequently at Belfast to observe their motions; that being the place where country gentlemen and officers then most haunted. The Lord of Ards, not finding it convenient as yet to discover himself, proposed to the committee that the country should subscribe the former declaration. The committee, being jealous of his sinister designs, waived it at this time; and in the meantime desired a further explication of that clause in it concerning their declining Ormond. To this they had words given them which might have been sufficient for men resolved to stand by their professions. But while this is doing, Monro was secretly commanded to come to Belfast and threaten to take it; the design of the Lord of Ards being to have Colonel Wallace out of it, who had been appointed governor of it by the council of war to please the Presbytery. Monro accordingly hastened to it, and threatened to fire the town. It was found not well enough manned and furnished to resist; upon which the Lord of Ards, with common advice, sent for a considerable party from his own regiment [at Comber] to assist the Belfast garrison against Monro; and the gentlemen and ministers were ordered to go home from the hazard of the enemy. Thus Ards's men entered publicly the town [on Wednesday, the 27th of June]; where, having secured himself, he then declared indeed what he was, produced his commission from the King, and discharged Wallace of his trust.

“This treachery of the Lord of Ards was an astonishing surprisal to the ministers and country, who formerly had concurred with him. They knew not where they were, nor what course to take. Mr. Anthony Shaw, then minister of Belfast, did with great zeal and ministerial authority upbraid the Lord of Ards before his officers for his strange dealing; showed how inconsistent he was with his former professions; and that ere long the righteous God, who hates falsehood of any kind, and in a special manner the betraying the truth and cause of God, would be avenged of him and his house. But my lord put all off by smooth pretences as yet; and told them he intended no hurt to the ministry or good people; and that, if they would comply with the government, they should find him a friend. But the ministers then, though young in years, had so much experience of men's falsehood, that they knew it was folly to lean to fair words.”

Accordingly, two days after this astounding discovery of the deliberate perfidy of a nobleman who, during the last six years, had enjoyed their entire confidence, who had shared their deepest sympathy in his captivity, and owed his liberty in a great measure to their generous interference, and who had hitherto cordially concurred in all their measures, the Presbytery, being met at Carrickfergus, still garrisoned by their friends, wrote to Lord Montgomery the following severe but faithful letter:—

“Right Honourable,

“The present strange alteration of affairs moves us to write our mind freely to your lordship; especially since, as it appears now clearly, you have been the chief author of all these calamities. We would first put your lordship in mind of the hazard you were in, before the Covenant was renewed, and how you complied with us then; for your own safety, with solemnity and forwardness you renewed the Covenant. You yourself first moved and framed a declaration in opposition to malignant courses, and all the present enemies of the cause of God. In the propositions to be offered to the King, you agreed that those concerning religion should be first offered; and if these were not granted, no other should be presented. Your declaration also bears a very large profession, both in general that you would do nothing in reference to religion without our consent and advice, and that lest God should leave you to fall in error; and particularly that you would acknowledge the King's demands, when he should give satisfaction in securing religion, before he were admitted to the exercise of his royal power. You all along shewed yourself ready to subscribe all orders against malignants; and so, by ample professions, engaged us the more deeply to give credit to your declarations and trust your faithfulness. Yet, nevertheless, your lordship hath had secret dealing to bring in malignants, and had correspondence with them; and all this time hath been dealing subtilly in your heart, professing one thing and intending another:—which has been a most notorious deceit to ensnare the people of God, and to advance your most sinister ends. Who could have believed that your lordship would have avowed a commission from the King, when he yet refuses, as much as his father, to secure religion, but follows wicked counsel; and so would have avowedly violated that article of your declaration? Or that you would own a wicked association of Irish Papists, and under colour of strengthening, should have betrayed that garrison of Belfast? We must be faithful in warning your lordship, though the Lord knows what heaviness it is to us, that the Lord will reward you, if you repent not for such a betraying of the faithful servants of God who would have plucked out their eyes for you; and the Lord will visit your family with sudden ruin and irreparable desolation, for that you have been so grand an instrument to destroy the work of God here. We exhort your lordship, in the name of the living God, to whom you must give an account, in haste to forsake that infamous and ungodly course you are now in, and adhere to your former professions; otherwise all the calamities that will ensue will be laid on your score. The Lord himself and all the faithful will set themselves against you; and we will testify of your unfaithfulness to the world, so long as the Lord shall give us strength. We shall yet continue to pray for your lordship's conversion, and shall expect your answer, remaining,

“Your lordship's servants in all duty,

“THE MINISTERS OF THE PRESBYTERY.

“At Carrickfergus, June 29, 1649.”

His lordship lost no time in replying to this unwelcome but well-merited exposure of his treachery. On the very next day, which was Saturday, and while his forces were compelling Captain Francis Ellis to surrender into his hands the town of Antrim, he addressed to the Presbytery the following letter, in which his falsehood and dissimulation still more clearly appear:—

“Reverend Friends,

“I cannot but with unexpressible grief resent the bitter expressions and ill-grounded wrong aspersions you are pleased to cast upon me in your letter, as if I had secretly brought in Sir George Monro his party into this country, and so have been the chief author of all these present distractions; whereof, God the searcher of hearts is my witness, I am free, notwithstanding of the jealousies raised upon some expressions in that letter of Sir George Monro to Sir Robert Stewart which was intercepted; and that among other many prevalent reasons and motions, too long here to express, inducing at this time to own his majesty's commission, it was not the betraying but the securing of these garrisons from Sir George his party, which, in our distracted and disjointed condition, for want of authority, and by reason of the soldiers' affection to their former officers, were likely to be rendered to him. The Lord he knows that the preservation of the established church-government, your peace, the good and quiet of this poor corner, and the advancement of religion according to the Covenant (all which, by private underminers, to your own knowledge, were in apparent hazard of ruin), are the chief reasons which induce me of this course of making use of that authority as the only means to secure us, being so united under command, from the violence of opposers hereunto. I request you, therefore, and until my carriage, after that now I am clothed with authority, may witness whether my intentions and resolutions be not according to my profession, you would be pleased to have more charitable thoughts of me; and rest assured that I am,

“Your affectionate faithful friend and servant,

“MONTGOMERY.

The manifest insincerity of this letter induced the Presbytery once more to address his lordship in vindication of their former statements. Without loss of time they drew up on Monday this second letter, which closed their correspondence :—

“ Right Honourable,

“ We received yours, wherein you with grief resent our bitter expressions and ill-grounded wrong aspersions, as much as to call them false, which you say we cast upon your lordship. Truly our expressions flow from the bitterness of grief and sorrow, and not disaffection towards you. You have often known our abundant affections and endeavour to serve your lordship in our stations. These which your lordship calls wrong aspersions are the words of truth and soberness. Intercepted letters from that party, together with Colonel Conway’s discovery of that which is now clear, with many other circumstances of your lordship’s latter carriage, and the exact correspondence between Colonel Monro’s motions and yours, do evince the reality of our assertions ; as well as his own letter, which we believe spake neither affection [affection] nor a conjecture of your lordship’s design, being written to such a close friend. It is a sad jest to your lordship to tell us that it was the securing of these garrisons from Colonel George Monro that moved you to put on that commission ; whereas, by the conjunction of your lordship’s forces and command, he lies before this garrison to destroy it. It were a good proof of the reality of your purpose if you should, with your whole power, urge him to remove ; which, if you were cordial in, were easy to do. Neither know we how to believe that your lordship’s present course is intended for the good of religion and the Covenant, when you are not only associated with the enemies of both, but your commission, as we are informed, subjects you to the immediate commands of the Marquess of Ormond, whose infamous and irreligious peace made with the rebels may easily tell us what establishment of the Covenant or presbyterial government we may expect from his orders and authority. His own printed speech to the council of Kilkenny explains to us his real resolutions concerning religion—‘To maintain the Christian religion in the large extent, and not under a strict notion of new invented names.’ And besides, the King yet refusing to secure religion, how shall you establish it, except you do very far transgress the limits of your commission, which we believe you desire no man to think? In a word, your lordship hath but reassumed the old quarrel which the engagers the last year, and, before them, James Grahame [Marquess of Montrose] and the malignants in England, were of old pursuing: Neither, we are confident, will it prosper better in your hands nor it did in theirs. The Lord in justice hath declared his displeasure against that course; and will do so against all them who seek to advance the King against Christ’s throne, and even while he refuses to give Christ his due first. We would therefore, yet again, as lovers of the standing of Christ’s kingdom, and of your lordship’s salvation, and as the messengers of God, beseech your lordship, before you run a further hazard of the Lord’s wrath, to leave off that ungodly course, and take better means to effectuate the good of religion. Remember those who honour God He will honour, and those who despise Him shall be lightly esteemed of. Whereas your lordship desires our charity towards you, truly as we have ever testified a due respect to yourself and family we shall yet continue. But you have involved yourself already, so far in the guilt of unfaithfulness to the cause of God and your own subscriptions, that we cannot but testify against the course you are in, and denounce judgment upon your person, family and all your party, till the Lord persuade your heart to return; which shall be our fervent desire, and shall remain,

“Your lordship’s servants in all dutiful observance,

“At Carrickfergus, 2d of July, 1649.”

The receipt of this letter, evincing the unyielding steadfastness of the Presbytery, quickened Montgomery in the execution of his designs. Instead of directing the Scottish commander to retire from Carrickfergus, as the ministers suggested, he sent orders on the very same day on which he received their reply, authorising Monro to demand immediate possession of the town and castle held since the departure of Monk by the Presbyterian forces under Major Edmond Ellis, “a worthy and religious gentleman.” On the following day, Montgomery joined Monro before the town, when the garrison, finding themselves wholly unprepared to oppose this sudden attack, and from so unexpected a quarter, agreed to surrender it upon favourable terms, which were immediately accepted and ratified.<sup>28</sup> Accordingly, on the 4th of July, the possession of the town and castle was transferred to the royalist party; and the notorious Dalzell of Binns, who had been formerly quartered there as an officer of General Robert Monro's regiment, was appointed governor. "He continued there, with a crew who followed him, by the Lord of Ards's command, for a short time, being a terror to the country about, and exacting from them what he thought meet." The Presbyterian ministers fled to the county of Down, whither Mr. John Greg, minister of Carrickfergus, and Mr. Robert Cunningham, minister of the adjoining parish at Broadisland, retired upon the surrender of the town. Though their safety was guaranteed by the articles of capitulation, they had too sad experience of the insincerity of the prelatical party to trust themselves to the insufficient security of even their most solemn engagements. It was well they and others took the precaution to withdraw, for Ormond soon after sent "Instructions" to their implacable enemy, Dalzell, of which the following is one that he would not have hesitated to execute with the utmost rigour:—"And if any ecclesiastical person shall presume to intermeddle, in pulpit or consistory, with the managery of civil affairs; or shall teach that his majesty is not to be admitted to the possession of his crown until he hath given satisfaction to his subjects, or until he have taken such oaths and covenants as are imposed upon him; upon proof thereof, without further circumstance, let his estate be confiscated to the use of the army, and himself be either imprisoned or banished, or tried for his life, as the enemy shall deserve."<sup>29</sup> within the province of Ulster, that either are, or hereafter shall be, joined under his command; and Major Ellis, governor of Carrickfergus, Major Cochran, governor of the castle, and the rest of the officers within the said town and castle, together with the mayor, sheriffs, aldermen, burgesses, and commons, of the other part; the 4th day of July, 1649." They are signed by Edmond Ellis, Brice Cochran, Henry Clements, Robert Hannay, Edward Ferguson, and Samuel Stewart.

<sup>29</sup> Abridged from Borlase, p. 216. These "Instructions" do not bear any particular address, but they were evidently designed for Colonel Dalzell, at Carrickfergus. See Inst., No. 6.

On the same day on which Lord Montgomery obtained possession of that important post, Carrickfergus, he published, in his new office as "commander-in-chief of all his majesty's forces in the province of Ulster," a long DECLARATION,<sup>30</sup> with the view of vindicating himself from the charges of tergiversation and perfidy to which he had so obviously exposed himself, and of persuading the Presbyterians, whom he had so long cajoled and so shamefully betrayed, to submit to his authority. To forward this latter object, he induced Lord Inchiquin, next in command to Ormond, and at this time engaged in the siege of Drogheda, to write to the Presbytery, assuring them that "Charles II. was resolved, for their satisfaction, to establish the Presbyterian government in Ulster," and earnestly entreating them to join with the royalists in upholding his majesty's cause. But the Presbytery were not now to be deceived, either by the illusory promises of Inchiquin, or the insincere, though positive, declaration of Montgomery. They met at Bangor, on the Saturday after the surrender of Carrickfergus; and having written a respectful letter to the former nobleman, explanatory of their proceedings, they drew up another elaborate paper in answer to the latter. It is entitled, "A DECLARATION BY THE PRESBYTERY AT BANGOR, the 7th of July 1649."<sup>31</sup> Like their other public documents, it

<sup>31</sup> This DECLARATION was republished in the latter end of Queen Anne's reign, when the Tories were rampant in both kingdoms, and severely commented on by the Rev. Dr. Tisdall, vicar of Belfast, the coryphæus of the northern High-Churchmen, with the view of proving that the Irish Presbyterians had, in it, so absolutely renounced monarchical principles, and so clearly exhibited their disloyalty and disaffection, as to be well worthy of that exclusion from office which had recently been effected by the passing of the Test Act in 1703. His pamphlet was published anonymously, with this ironical title, "A Sample of True-blew Presbyterian Loyalty in all changes and turns of government: To which is added a Declaration of the Presbytery at Bangor, Anno 1649." Dublin, 1709, 4to, pp. 31. The Rev. R. Macbride, of Belfast, replied to it in another anonymous pamphlet, which he appositely entitled, "A Sample of Jet-black Prelatic Calumny, &c., &c. To which is added an Apology for the Declaration of the Presbytery at Bangor." Glasgow, 1713, pp. 218. Tisdall followed up his attack on the

was read from all their pulpits, "though with some opposition in some congregations where malignant officers were present; yet no violence was done to the ministers."

This DECLARATION is too long to be inserted here; and being directed almost exclusively to the refutation of Montgomery's declaration, it possesses little public interest. A few paragraphs, however, may be given, as exhibiting the reasons which induced the Presbytery to take this step, and the course which they exhorted their people to adopt in this difficult crisis. It thus commences: "As we have, upon every remarkable change of affairs in this land, from our watch-tower blown the trumpet unto the people, by setting before them the true state of their own condition, and giving them warning of their duty in these dark and troublesome times; so a greater mystery of iniquity being now discovered than was ever before, and of greater danger to the people of God than any former design which has been known among us, we cannot forbear to cry aloud to our flocks to beware of ravenous wolves who have risen to devour them. The danger we were in by sectaries we have formerly represented at large, and have sufficiently vindicated our actions relating to them. The late unexpected invasion of malignants we have faithfully informed our people of, and pressed upon them their duty of opposing the same. And now it hath pleased the Lord to suffer men among ourselves to be our enemies; those who took sweet counsel together with us, renewed the Covenant, and entered into a solemn declaration, do now lift up themselves against us, and, under Ulster Presbyterians by a second pamphlet, more virulent and calumnious than the former one, under the title of "The Conduct of the Dissenters of Ireland, with respect both to Church and State." Dublin, 1712, 4to, pp. 104. These most intolerant and mischievous tracts occasioned the publication of the well-known volume, entitled, "An Historical Essay upon the Loyalty of Presbyterians in Great Britain and Ireland, from the Reformation to this present year, 1713." 4to, pp. 564. It was published anonymously; but its author was the Rev. J. Kirkpatrick, another of the ministers of Belfast. It is quoted in this work, under the running title of "Presbyterian Loyalty." a pretence of delivering us, have indeed been the principal instruments to ruin us, and the work of God among us, if the Lord restrain them not from accomplishing their whole design. The chief head of those who pretend authority above the rest is the Lord-Viscount of Ards, whose present actions are so repugnant to his former professions, that no Christian or ingenuous man can think upon them without horror and detestation. His forwardness to renew the Covenant, his fervency to have a solemn band and declaration subscribed and entered into, his large promises to defend religion, his disclaiming all conjunction with Papists or rebels with words of zeal and disdain, his insinuations upon all honest men for gaining them to him, his consenting to all public orders against malignants—being compared with his late undertakings, must clearly present to every man's view the great dissimulation and betraying of the people and Covenant he is guilty of; for which our sorrow and grief is no less than our rejoicing had been great to have seen his lordship stand faithful, which was one of our chiefest desires." After proving that the cause now supported by Ormond and Montgomery was identical with that so obstinately maintained by the late King, against the Long Parliament, and that their own proceedings were in exact accordance with the principles which guided the patriots of the preceding reign in opposing the illegal and arbitrary exercise of the prerogative, in matters both of religion and government, they conclude with the following exhortation:—"For this cause, as the ambassadors of Christ, we beseech our people, in His stead, not to join hands in such a course, or to meddle with them who are given to change. And particularly we charge all who have renewed the Covenant, and have entered into the declaration of the army and country, not to join in executing such a commission by taking charge in the army under the present command, or serving them either as officers or soldiers; else we foretell them, in the name of the God of truth, that the quarrel of the Covenant shall pursue them, and they shall wring out the dregs of the cup which malignants have been drinking these many years bypast. Yea, their judgments shall be enlarged far above the former; because they have both seen the other's plagues, and have of late renewed the Covenant which malignants oppose. We do also, in the name of Jesus Christ, warn the people of our charge to keep themselves free from all compliance with their ungodly course, either by speaking favourably of them, acknowledging the authority of the present command under the Marquis of Ormond and the Lord of Ards, by imposing of cess upon others for maintaining their unlawful power, or by constant obeying their orders in paying of cess unto their army; all which is sinful compliance, and a breach of the Covenant, as well as to fight in their quarrel; for it is a promoting of their course, though not by arms, yet by supplying the sinews of war, money and victuals. Neither can any necessity be excuse to it, for we ought to choose affliction rather than sin. To help the ungodly, and to strengthen the hands of the wicked, is an evil worse than any suffering. 'There are none in this land who formerly suffered for righteousness' sake who need this day to repent it, and for whom the Lord provided not abundantly in their greatest want. And, therefore, we do again exhort them to stand fast to the Covenant, that neither persuasion nor terror may withdraw them from the truth which is now opposed; but that they lament for former sins which bring on these calamities, turn in to the Lord and embrace the Gospel, and to rejoice in the cross of Christ; and when the times of refreshing shall come from the presence of the Lord, their sins shall be blotted out, and the Lord shall return their captivity like the streams of the south."

To this Declaration Montgomery did not venture to reply; but he sent one of his officers to the Presbytery, when met the following week, to accuse them of treason, and threaten them with imprisonment. The conduct of the ministers on this occasion is thus narrated by one of their number :—"The Presbytery, after they had been accused by the Lord Ards, in a message by one of his officers, viz., Hugh Montgomery, of mutiny, treason, and sedition, in face of the Presbytery ; and after they had sent some of their number to discourse with him of his proceedings ; and these receiving no satisfaction, but were partly mocked, partly threatened, though not without some exhortations of peace, and promises to give the civil sanction to the Presbytery by virtue of his commission from the King, if they would not oppose the present course ; the Lord of Ards was ordered to be summoned to the Presbytery as one who had owned himself of their number and under their jurisdiction, but now fallen from his former professions, and become guilty of a fearful breach of Covenant, &c. This summons they knew he would undervalue ; and accordingly he enquired of the person summoning him, by what authority he did so ? Yet the Presbytery judged it their duty, in this case, to own the authority Christ had put into their hands. And indeed the Lord so ordered matters that for a little time they were not troubled ; the Lord Ards not judging it fit for his design at this time. In the meantime, however, while the country and Presbytery were in confusion, they go on with the admission of Mr. Henry Maine and Mr. William Richardson in a more private way, as the times would admit ; the former was settled minister at Isle-Magee, and the latter at Killileagh.<sup>32</sup> The Presbytery also received an encouraging letter from the ministers in Edinburgh.

"The Lord Ards, seeing he could not prevail with ministers to be silent from testifying against his course, or from the exercise of jurisdiction, he summoned the ruling-elders to

<sup>32</sup> A short time afterwards, the Rev. Fergus Alexander was ordained to the pastoral charge of Greyabbey, in Down, and the Rev. Andrew Stewart, son of the Rev. appear before him, that he might threaten them from joining with the ministers: but the elders by advice withdrew themselves. And George Munro directed a letter by way of summons to some of the brethren, as then commissioned by the Lord-Lieutenant Ormond, to compear before him at Coleraine; with certification that, if they did not, he would pursue them, telling them that he was informed their preaching tended to the prejudice of the King's interest; and that if they would undertake not to meddle in State affairs, nor to encroach on the magistrate's power, they should have countenance from him. Upon consideration of the threatenings of a prevailing party, now become enemies, in the country, and assisted with Irish rebels; and of some ministers already being violently hindered to preach in their own pulpits; and there being an information gone up to Ormond against the ministers, desiring he would use some violent course with them for restraining them; and furthermore, that ministers could not preach freely against the present enemies without apparent violence; they resolved unanimously, that brethren finding themselves in apparent hazard, and not in a capacity to exercise their ministry, may withdraw for a time, till God give an open door again. Meantime, they had a letter from the General Assembly of Scotland, by their commissioner, Mr. A. Ferguson.<sup>33</sup> But the storm growing more violent, some of the ministers, partly to shun present hazard, partly

<sup>33</sup> This meeting of the General Assembly—memorable as the last which sat till after the Revolution—was opened on the 7th of July, and closed on the 6th of August. Balfour, under the date of the 11th of July, says—"Mr. Ferguson, a minister, returned to Ireland this day" (Annals, iii., 415), which corroborates Adair. Yet Baillie, in his account of the proceedings of this Assembly, says—"Our brethren of Ireland had sent Mr. John Greg to us to have our advice about their carriage in my Lord of Ards' defection. No public advice was given: but Mr. Livingston and Mr. McClelland were appointed to confer with him on all his propositions."—Letters, ii., 343. It is probable Mr. Ferguson had been appointed their usual commissioner to the Assembly, and had proceeded to Scotland, before Montgomery's treachery had been discovered; and that thereafter Mr. Greg, being obliged, at all events, to fly from Carrickfergus, had been specially sent over for advice, and had arrived before the close of the Assembly. The only notices extant of the proceedings of this Assembly in relation to Ireland are the following entries in the index to the printed acts:—"Sess. 3. Recommend business of having some other occasions, did retire a little to Scotland. But having discoursed with worthy and experienced ministers there, and being advised by them, did presently return. Others, however, staid in the country at that time."<sup>34</sup>

This inauspicious domination of the royalist party in Ulster was of short duration, but their downfall brought little relief to the Presbyterians. After the surrender of Carrickfergus, Monro returned to Coleraine, of which he was appointed governor, and thence marched to Derry, where, on the 11th of July, he again joined the besiegers with a considerable reinforcement of horse and foot, and twelve pieces of field-ordnance.<sup>35</sup> The blockade which had, in the meantime, been maintained with considerable success, was now carried on with additional vigour, this being the only stronghold in Ulster that held out against the royalists. Mr. Trail was forced to leave Ireland by the conduct of the Lord of Ards.

<sup>35</sup> The following is an abstract of the proceedings of the siege during the month of June:—"June 1st. All our horse [from the city], with 150 foot, went over the water to Goldsmiths' new town, and routed the enemy [the Presbyterian forces], killed about thirty, took a prey of 300 cows, many sheep and some horses, and fired and killed to the Mough (Muff) without loss. 3rd. The cows being too many to keep for eating up our grass, and not fit to kill, so many as were not useful were sold to the enemy for ten shillings a piece upon parole, and were currently paid. 8th. The enemy in one night built an incredible piece of work, within almost musket-shot of our town, upon the top of the hill on the way to Ballymackrooty; the lord president [Coote] destroyed it next day after a sharp skirmish, and challenged the leaguer to come out and fight him. 13th. A new fort, which we were a building at the Windmill, was near finished; but was thrown down by the enemy this night: the wind being high, he was not discovered till done. 18th. Whitecastle plundered by some of our men, and the seamen got some malt, barley, meal, &c. 19th. The Scotch boat that had been taken with the cows and horses was manned out, and this day brought in two other small Scotch boats from Coleraine for Scotland, laden with staves, clobords [?], rounds [coarse meal], and some butter." Captain Finch, the writer of the diary, here observes: "After three months' siege there is not one sick or feeble body among us, and now in a better condition than the first day of the siege: our greatest want is and will be firing, there being no other firing than old houses, and trees got out of orchards; for we suppose provisions will be plentifully sent us by the parliament."

the communication with the city by sea, they built a fort at the knock of Ember,<sup>36</sup> near the narrowest part of the river between Culmore castle and the town, to which, in honour of his majesty, they gave the name of Charles-Fort. No sooner was it completed than Coote directed Captain Keyser, the commander of a parliamentary frigate in the lough<sup>37</sup> to proceed with an hundred musketeers in boats to attack and demolish it; but the fort being well manned, and mounted with eleven pieces of ordnance, they were repulsed and obliged to return to Culmore. Keyser and his crew, who had captured several vessels bound for Scotland from Coleraine and other neighbouring ports, were supported almost entirely by the plunder of Ennishowen; into which district parties of horse were also occasionally sent by Coote, to levy contributions in meal and cattle for the support of his garrison. On the 26th of July, Lord Montgomery, with his own regiment and a considerable force, joined the besiegers; and having sent Coote a copy of his commission from Charles II., he summoned him to surrender the city to his majesty's army. This ineffectual summons was followed up on the 28th by a smart attack upon the town, in which, though several of the garrison were killed, Montgomery was repulsed with considerable loss, Lieutenant-Colonel Robert Galbraith being dangerously wounded, and Captain Fleming, of Faughanvale, Lieutenant M'Clelland, with several officers and nearly forty men, being killed. On the same day two ships from below Culmore came up the river to attack Charles-Fort, but the wind failing them—another singular coincidence with the events of the second siege—they were unable either to proceed or to return.

The Presbytery's Declaration had, by this time, reached the Lagan, and began to be privately circulated among the Presbyterian soldiery, as yet unacquainted with the perfidy of their general. No sooner did they read this paper, and perceive the true character of the cause for which they were hazarding their lives, than the greater number of the officers of the Lagan forces, and of Lord Montgomery's regiments, threw up their commissions, and with their men abandoned the siege. "Our viscount and general," writes the indignant compiler of the Montgomery Manuscripts, "was hopefull to reduce that important place to his majestie's obedience. The fault was not in his lordship, but in those Lagan men; who no sooner knew of his lordship having accepted a commission from the King without their kirk-pastors' leave, and that he would no longer admit their ministers into his councils, nor walk by their advice, than the whole gang or crew of them deserted the siege and his lordship, they all at once disbanding themselves with one text of Scripture, 'to your tents, O Israel!'"<sup>38</sup> On the 29th of July, the soldiers were observed from the city to be taking their departure in great haste and in considerable numbers. The siege, however, was still maintained, though with diminished vigour. A few days afterwards, a party of dragoons from the city sallied out into the county of Donegal, and burned Carrigans, Newtowncunningham, and St. Johnston. But on the 7th of August, to the great surprise and dismay of the besiegers—who did not expect to see the Roman Catholic party leagued with the republicans in opposing the royalists—Owen Roe O'Neill, upon a treaty privately concluded with Coote, came to the relief of Derry, and with a body of three hundred horse and four thousand foot encamped on the opposite side of the river.<sup>39</sup> Lord Montgomery and Sir Robert

Stewart were consequently compelled to raise the siege. On the second day after O'Neill's arrival, they broke up their encampment, and returned by Ballykelly and Coleraine, "with their companies," to their former quarters in Down and Antrim. The castles in the vicinity of Derry and in the Lagan were immediately surrendered to Coote, with the exception of that at Raphoe, which Bishop John Leslie, who had returned to Ulster after the death of the King, defended with great bravery for a length of time.

The republican party were now masters of the north-western portion of the province. The royalists, unsupported by the Presbyterians, held their garrisons of Coleraine and Carrickfergus by a precarious tenure; and soon after there appeared in Ireland a victorious general, who, by his vigorous and successful prosecution of the war, speedily rendered the arms of the infant republic of England triumphant throughout the entire island. This was OLIVER CROMWELL, whose arrival at Dublin, on the 15th of August, soon put an end to the brief ascendancy of the prelatical party, and completely changed the aspect of affairs in Ulster.

Captain Finch concludes his diary by saying—"The whole country in effect comes in, submits, and gets protections." Owen Roe O'Neill took ill before he left Derry, and never recovered. He was carried in a litter to Cloughouter castle, in Cavan, where he died, Nov. 6, 1649.—Des. Cur. Hib., ii., 521.

CHAPTER XV.

Cromwell takes the field—Storming of Drogheda—Venerables sent into Ulster—Takes Lishburn and Belfast—Death of Owen O'Connolly—Antrim burned by Monro—Carrickfergus surrendered to Venables—Defeat of the Royalists near Lishburn—The Republican party threaten the Presbytery—Progress of the Independents—Military operations between the Irish and the Republicans—The former defeated near Letterkenny. The latter take Charlemont and terminate the war in Ulster—The engagement pressed—Ministers imprisoned—Correspondence with Venables—Coot's declaration—Parliamentary commissioners—Death of Major Ellis—Increased privations of the ministers—Many withdraw to Scotland—Names of those remaining in the country—Challenged by the Independents to a public discussion, which takes place at Antrim—Fleetwood appointed a commissioner—High Court of Justice—Notices of Baptist and Independent preachers—Ker and O'Quin restored to communion—Two ministers wait on Fleetwood and the council in Dublin—Papers of the ministers are seized—They are summoned to appear at Carrickfergus—Are threatened to be removed out of the country—but dismissed with unexpected favour.

ROMWELL had no sooner landed than he took the field with a formidable army of brave and experienced troops, and prosecuted the war with a vigour for which the enemies of the republic were wholly unprepared. In the end of August he marched from Dublin, and on Monday, the 2nd of September, invested Drogheda, which Ormond had garrisoned with the choicest of his men, under the command of Sir Arthur Aston, a Roman Catholic general of high military reputation. Cromwell having completed his batteries within a week, formally summoned the governor to surrender the town. This summons being promptly rejected, on the following day he effected a breach in the walls, and his troops being twice repulsed, he placed himself at the head of the reserve, and led them on to victory. The town was taken by storm after a desperate defence; no quarter was given; the garrison were put to the sword; numbers of the defenceless inhabitants perished; and the name and the arms of Cromwell were invested with such terror, that the smaller towns speedily surrendered. Two days afterwards he despatched a considerable body of horse and foot, under Colonel Venables, to extend his conquests in Ulster. When the troops appeared before Dundalk they found it deserted by the royalists; and a few days afterwards he took the strong and well-fortified castle of Carlingford, in which were large supplies of ammunition and arms. On the following day Newry, with its castle, was in like manner ceded to Venables, who had advanced so rapidly that he was obliged to remain here a few days until the main body of his forces overtook him.<sup>1</sup> He thence marched to Dromore, and "encamped in a field to the south-west of the town by the highway-side, well enclosed with hedges," where a party of the royalist cavalry, under Colonel Trevor, suddenly falling on his troops during the night, had nearly routed and dispersed them. But Venables, having rallied his men after this unexpected assault, attacked Trevor at daybreak; and having rescued Major Viller and Captain Usher, with several others who had been taken prisoners, and having retaken two standards which had been captured by Major Chatfield of the royalist horse, he compelled them to retire towards the Bann, while he prosecuted his march without molestation to Lisburn. He arrived at that town on the 27th of September, and being joined by a troop of horse commanded by Major Brough, formerly under Monck, he invested Belfast, which, on the 30th, was surrendered by Lord Montgomery's regiment, after having occupied it for the brief period of three months.<sup>2</sup> He placed a garrison in Lisburn, and another in Antrim, under the command of the celebrated Owen O'Connolly, now a lieutenant-colonel, and an adherent to the republican party.

Venables fixed his head-quarters at Belfast, and having as yet neither troops nor artillery sufficient for investing Carrickfergus, held by the royalists under Dalzell, he suspended further proceedings, and despatched intelligence of his progress to Coote, with orders to join him with a reinforcement without delay. In the latter end of August, a thousand men had safely landed at Derry from England, at the head of whom Coote scoured the surrounding country; and, fearing a second siege, he accumulated a considerable stock of provisions within the city.<sup>3</sup> In compliance with the suggestion of Venables, he marched to Coleraine, which was betrayed to him, and compelled Sir George Monro to retire towards Carrickfergus. Monro having sent a party under Colonel John Hamilton to rescue the town of Antrim from O'Connolly, an encounter took place which proved fatal to the latter, and which is thus narrated by Adair:—"There was an observable passage concerning a person mentioned before as a great instrument for good to the city of Dublin, and to all Ireland, viz., Major O'Connolly. He had fallen in with the sectarian party, got the command of the regiment in Antrim which formerly belonged to his old master, Sir John Clotworthy, now a sufferer and prisoner under that party of the sectaries, for his declining their courses and adhering to the King's just rights and interests. This O'Connolly with some few English met accidentally with a party under the command of, as well as the company of, Colonel John Hamilton (who at that time was subject to Colonel George Monro then in the country), at Dunadry, near Antrim, where there was a sharp debate. O'Connolly was mortally wounded, and carried with no more respect than a dead ox behind a man to Connor, where he immediately died.<sup>4</sup> This man, for what could be observed, was of an ingenuous nature and truly sincere; yet he was then deceived by the pretences of that party, and seemed violent that way. Therefore, though God had brought him to great respect and a considerable estate upon occasion of his former faithfulness at the breaking out of the Rebellion; yet falling from his first principles, and going along with that declining party, the Lord would punish him with this temporal stroke of being cut off after this manner, for a warning to others to beware of such courses. Besides his wife died very shortly after, and left a son and daughter; his son a very idiot unto the greatest height, and the daughter, though thereafter married to a worthy gentleman, Mr. Hugh Rowley, yet proved but more than half a fool, and a burden to her husband for many years, and without posterity.<sup>5</sup> George Munro having a party with him, most of them Irish who had been rebels and concluded in the peace [with Ormond], about this time coming along towards Antrim, and alleging that they fired against him from the mount, he set fire to the town, which burnt it all except some few houses; he also afterwards burnt Lisnegarvey:—the one having been long famous for a place where the Gospel flourished and where godliness was countenanced both by landlord and inhabitants, the other a place where neither landlord nor people, a very few excepted, did give countenance or entrance to the Gospel:—which teaches us not to judge by events as to these common calamities.”

<sup>5</sup> These children were named Arthur and Martha O'Connolly. In the Appendix, the reader will see that they received a pension from Cromwell's government of ten shillings each weekly. Lodge (v. 297<sup>1</sup>) does not mention any issue of this marriage with Mr. Rowley, which confirms Adair's account.

In the meantime, Coote had followed Monro from Coleraine, and had effected a junction with Venables at Belfast, and their united forces invested Carrickfergus in the end of October. Dalzell, unable to prolong the defence, resolved to capitulate; and on the 2nd of November, articles of surrender, stipulating for the delivery of the town and castle on the 13th of December, were agreed to and regularly signed.<sup>6</sup> During this interval Coote and Venables, notwithstanding the season, resolved to take the field. Monro having burned Antrim and Lisburn, had joined Lords Clanbrassil and Montgomery in the county of Down, and in expectation of a reinforcement from Ormond,<sup>7</sup> they were preparing to attack Venables at Belfast, with the view of relieving the garrison at Carrickfergus before its final surrender into his hands. But the uninterrupted victories of Cromwell in Munster prevented Ormond from despatching any assistance to the north; and the time for the delivery of Carrickfergus rapidly approaching, the royalist leaders at length mustered their forces and resolved to risk an engagement. Coote and Venables, apprised of their plans, met them “on the plains of Lisnegarvey,” at a place called Lisnestrain, not far from Lisburn.<sup>8</sup> On Thursday, the 6th of December, the engagement took place, when the royalists, led on by Lords Clanbrassil and Montgomery, and their horse by Sir George

Monro, were defeated and totally dispersed. Many inferior officers and nearly a thousand men were slain, and their baggage, arms, and ammunition were taken. Monro fled to Charlemont, and thence to Enniskillen, and the Lords Clanbrassil and Montgomery with difficulty escaped and joined Ormond in the south.<sup>9</sup> Agreeably to the articles of surrender, Coote took possession of Carrickfergus on the 13th of December, and Dalzell retired to Charlemont; so that, with the exception of this small fort and that at Enniskillen, the royalist party were dispossessed of all their garrisons in Ulster. Thus the enterprise of Lord Montgomery, for which he had abandoned his friends, betrayed the Presbytery, and involved himself in the guilt of deliberate falsehood, if not of perjury, proved wholly abortive; and the republicans became once more the masters of the province, of which they held uninterrupted possession until the Restoration.

<sup>9</sup> The particulars of this decisive engagement are only to be found in a small pamphlet, entitled, "Two Letters from Wm. Basil, Esq., attorney-general of Ireland: The one to the Right Hon. John Bradshaw, lord-president of the council of state; the other to the Right Honourable William Lenthal, Esq., speaker of the parliament of England, of a great victory obtained by the parliament's forces in the North of Ireland on the plains of Lisnegarvey, &c. With a relation of the taking of Drumcree (in Armagh), and of the surrender of Carrickfergus upon articles." Lond., 1649, 4to, pp. 7. At the end of the first letter, which is dated from Dublin, December 12, 1649, is the following postscript, giving a summary of the whole affair:—"This night Colonel Chidley Coote is come to town with letters from his brother, the lord-president; the substance of his brother's letters, and his own relation is briefly thus:—The Scotch lords and George Munroe fell into the Claneboys with 4000 men; and on the 5th of this instant the enemy drew out their army, and would have fought, but our party wanting some horse forbore to engage. The next day the enemy drew off, and our army following them, sent out a forlorn hope of 200 men, the horse commanded by Captain Dunbar, of Sir Theophilus Jones his regiment, and the foot by Major Gore, of the lord-president's regiment; the 200 men fell upon the rear of the enemy, and, before the army could come up, with the loss of one corporal and two private soldiers, routed the whole army, of whom were slain in the place a thousand men. The president writes—And a party of horse, commanded the nearest way to the Blackwater to stay that pass, slew four hundred more there, where George Munroe saved himself by swimming." In the letter itself, it is stated—"Colonel Henderson, a Scotchman, who betrayed Sligo to the Irish, was killed. Colonel John Hamilton, one other Scotchman, who killed O'Connolly and burnt Lisnegarvey, is taken prisoner." See also Whitelocke, p. 435, from which it appears that, in the first account of the engagement that reached London, Lord Clanbrassil or Claneboy was reported to have sunk in a bog, by reason of his great corpulency, and to have thus lost his life.

During these vicissitudes in the government of Ulster, the Presbytery persevered in testifying against the power of the usurpers, and in favour of a limited monarchy in the person of Charles II. Venables, on his first arrival at Belfast, and while the success of his expedition to the north was yet uncertain, protected and countenanced the ministers. "He did at this time," writes Adair, "emit a declaration to encourage ministers of the country, giving all encouragement to the well-affected and those who had been in opposition to the malignant party before; declaring it was for their preservation he was sent to this country, and in order to that for reducing the malignants:—this declaration was sent out in September, 1649." After he had taken possession of Carrickfergus, as governor of the north-eastern parts of Ulster, and had dispersed his troops in winter quarters throughout the country, the ministers first began to encounter opposition. "At this time the ministers preached publickly in their congregations, and continued to pray for the new King, and declare against the sectarian party; which did endanger divers of the brethren in those places where any of the army heard them preach. The officers threatened them with severity, and the rude soldiers did so also. However the governor, Colonel Venables, though he was informed of these prayers and preachings, yet was not sudden to call ministers to question. Having had occasion to discourse with some of them in places where he sometimes travelled, he found them sober and religious, and in every thing was pleased with them except in that one particular. He studied much to insinuate upon them as he met with them; but especially he forbore, in regard he was not yet fixed in the country, and the enemies remaining therein." In their present difficulties the ministers enjoyed the sympathy and co-operation of their parent church in Scotland. Charles II. having accepted the propositions submitted to him at Breda by commissioners from the estates of Scotland, among whom was the Rev. John Livingston, that kingdom prepared to accept him as their sovereign, and to maintain his cause by arms against the parliament of England. Under these circumstances the commission of the Church sent over ministers to Ulster, in the month of April, to encourage the Presbytery in their opposition to the usurpers, and in their adherence to the King, now solemnly pledged to support the Covenant.<sup>10</sup>

Meanwhile, the Independents eagerly availed themselves of republican ascendancy to advance the interests of their party in Ireland; but though, during the space of ten years, they enjoyed without interruption a State endowment and the support of the civil power, they utterly failed in establishing themselves as a religious sect in the kingdom. They relied wholly on the patronage of the government as then administered; their teachers resided exclusively in the garrison towns, or within military quarters; and when, at the Restoration, the power of the usurpers was overthrown, almost all the ministers fled, and their congregations dispersed; and in a few years, with the exception of one or two in Dublin, and perhaps a like number in Munster, not an Independent Church existed throughout the kingdom. The first step of that party was to procure the appointment of the celebrated Doctor John Owen, their most distinguished divine, to be chaplain to Cromwell. To this influential office he was nominated on the 2nd of July, 1649, at the usual salary, with an additional sum of one hundred pounds a year, to be paid quarterly to his wife and family,<sup>11</sup> who remained in England while he accompanied his patron to Ireland. He took up his residence in the castle, and during his short stay in Dublin was a con-

Orme, in his elaborate, but inaccurate, "Life of Owen," mentions this allowance to his family as if it had been the whole amount received by Owen, and adds—"This was no great reward for leaving his family and an affectionate congregation." He entirely suppresses the fact that Owen received in Ireland the salary of £200 per annum, with other advantages, in addition to what was paid to his wife in England.

stant preacher in the city.<sup>12</sup> He returned to England in the January following, and, on the last day of February, preached by appointment before the parliament, and urged them to prosecute with vigour their measures for the spread of the Gospel in this country.<sup>13</sup> Three months previously, a bill had been introduced "for the better advancement of the Gospel and learning in Ireland," which finally passed into a law on the 8th of March. The object of this bill was simply to vest the estates of the archbishopric of Dublin and bishopric of Meath, with those of the dean and chapter of St. Patrick's Cathedral in Dublin, in certain trustees,<sup>14</sup> for the better support of Trinity College, the erection of a second college in the metropolis, the support of professors in the university, and the maintenance of a free school. On the same day on which this act was passed, the parliament entered into resolutions to abolish the hierarchy and the use of the Common Prayer-book in Ireland, and to "send over forthwith six able ministers to dispense the Gospel in the city of Dublin." To each of these ministers they voted a liberal salary of two hundred pounds per annum, to be paid quarterly out of the public revenue of Ireland; and should any of them die while employed on this service, they engaged to make competent provision for their wives and children.<sup>15</sup> The names of these ministers cannot now be ascertained; but about this time Mr. Timothy Taylor, joint pastor of a congregational church at Duckenfield, in Cheshire, settled as chaplain to Venables at his head-quarters in Carrickfergus;<sup>16</sup> and other Independent and Baptist teachers were admitted to officiate, to the exclusion of the Presbyterian clergy, in the few garrison towns of Ulster.

<sup>12</sup> That the parliament were early expected to bestir themselves in behalf of the Independents and other sectaries in Ireland, appears from the following curious pamphlet, published before Cromwell was appointed to the office of lord-lieutenant. It is entitled, "Zion's thankful echoes from the cliffs of Ireland: or the little Church of Christ in Ireland warbling out her humble and grateful addresses to her elder sister in England. And in particular to the parliament, to his excellency, and to his army, or that part assigned to her assistance now in her low yet hopeful condition." Lond. 4to, 1649, pp. 25. It is a semi-religious poetical rhapsody, and consists of addresses (1) to the Church in England; (2) to the parliament of England; (3) to his Excellency the Lord Fairfax; (4) to the English commanders and soldiers assigned for the relief of Ireland. The prefatory lines are subscribed by Edward Calver.

<sup>13</sup> The following is an extract from Owen's sermon on this occasion:—"I would there were for the present one Gospel preacher for every walled town in the English possession in Ireland. The land mourneth, and the people perish for want of knowledge; many run to and fro, but it is upon other designs—knowledge is not increased. They are sensible of their wants, and cry out for supply. The tears and cries of the inhabitants of Dublin after the manifestations of Christ are ever in my view. If they were in the dark, and loved to have it so, it might in some respects close the door upon the bowels of our compassion; but they cry out of their darkness, and are ready to follow every one whosoever, to have a candle."—Works, xv., 287, 288.

So anxious was Cromwell to secure an adequate supply of such teachers, that he wrote to New England inviting ministers to come over, and offering ample encouragement should they consent to settle in this kingdom. On the last day of October, several Independent ministers wrote from America to Cromwell, thanking him in fulsome terms for his "noble proposals," and assuring him that, on certain conditions, which they were prudent enough to specify at length, they were disposed to accept his offer; "and if the Lord's mind," say they, "shall clearly appear to give us a sufficient call and encouragement to remove into Ireland to serve the Lord Jesus there, we shall cheerfully and thankfully embrace the same. Among these conditions, they stipulated, not only for the establishment of their worship and government as already incorporated with the state in New England, and for a due "proportion of outward encouragement in houses and lands," but also for assistance to their people to remove with them, for a settlement "in the more healthful part of the country," for a freedom for several years from public charges, and for permission to choose from the members of their own Church the future governor of their settlement, within which they desire that no Irish may be permitted to inhabit. Whether in this negotiation the Independent teachers succeeded in obtaining the various privileges for which they stipulated, and subsequently removed to Ireland, it is now impossible to ascertain.<sup>17</sup>

<sup>16</sup> Wood's Ath. Oxon., ii., col. 682. Taylor was at first a Presbyterian, but, so soon as the influence of that party began to decline in parliament, like many others of his brethren, he became an Independent. In defence of this seasonable change of opinion, his colleague and he published a pamphlet in November, 1645, and in July following a second in defence of the former, which had been successfully attacked by a Presbyterian minister at Manchester. In these joint productions the authors' names are thus given—"Mr. Samuel Eaton, teacher, and Timothy Taylor, pastor, of the church in Duckenfield, in Cheshire." He does not appear to have published anything after his settlement at Carrickfergus, where he enjoyed an endowment of two hundred per annum (see Appendix), and occupied the same residence which had been previously held by the rector of the parish, and the rent of which was paid by the corporation.

So soon as the season permitted, vigorous preparations were made both by the royalists and the republicans for renewing the war. The former, comprising both the prelatical party under Ormond, and the Irish confederates, held a provincial council at Belturbet, on the 18th of March, to choose a general in room of the late Owen Roe O'Neill. Among the candidates for this office, who, with one exception, were Romanists, were the Marquis of Antrim, Sir Phelim O'Neill, and Heber (or Ever) M'Mahon, the titular bishop of Clogher. The predominance of clerical influence in the council secured the election of the latter, who soon after published a declaration vindicating their proceedings; and prepared to wrest the strongholds of Ulster out of the hands of the republicans.<sup>18</sup>

<sup>17</sup> See Nickolls' "State Papers," Lond., 1743, fol., pp. 44, 45, where this letter of the Independent ministers to Cromwell and their "Conditions" are given at length. These documents are reprinted in the second series of Ellis's "Letters illustrative of English History," vol. iii., p. 360, (No. 300.) They are followed by two letters written by Cromwell (Nos. 301 and 302), both of which had already been printed in that note-able work, Harris's "Cromwell," pp. 536, 537. These expensive volumes by Sir Henry Ellis purport to contain letters which had never been published before. My very limited examination of them, however, has thus detected three exceptions within the compass of as many pages, and perhaps there may be more.

This party were not inactive. In the month of April, Coote obtained possession of Enniskillen from Sir George Monro, who, despairing of relief, surrendered the town and castle on favourable terms for himself and his adherents, most of whom accompanied him to Scotland. Having garrisoned this important post, on the 14th of April Coote collected his troops that had quartered during the winter in the Lagan, and sent orders to Venables to take the field and join him before Charlemont, with the view of commencing the campaign by the reduction of that fort.<sup>19</sup> But the mitred general, having mustered his army at Monaghan, resolved to prevent, if possible, this proposed junction of his two formidable opponents. For this purpose he despatched a party who surprised the castle and fort of Toome; and, having repaired its fortifications, he pushed forward a considerable body of horse and foot to annoy the English at Antrim. This skilful manœuvre, while it effected the object which he had in view, gained time for him to recruit his army. Venables was compelled to return from Charlemont for the protection of his quarters in the county of Antrim, and to invest Toome, which held out against him for several weeks. It was at length surrendered to him upon quarter, "after it had stood a strong batterie and a mortar-piece; and, being reintrencht, could not have been gained of his Majesties forces of the province of Ulster." It is dated at Charlemont, 20th May, 1650, and is signed by M'Mahon, under the official designation of "Emeras Cloughensis," and by twenty-one of the council. When published in London, it was accompanied by nine pages of "Remarques or Observations," which bear indisputable evidence of their having proceeded from the vigorous and eloquent pen of Milton, though they have not been noticed by any of his numerous biographers as one of his productions. See the original pamphlet, entitled, "A Declaration of the Irish armie in Ulster, sent to the parliament in a letter from William Basill, Esq., attorney-general of Ireland, &c. To which is added a Perfect Relation of the victorie over this Irish armie com'n to hand since their Declaration was put to press." Lond., 1650, 4to, pp. 24.

Coote had, in the meantime, marched from Derry, "by the Lough-side into Tyrone, to make prey of their kriaughts<sup>20</sup> which lay in those great fastnesses of Glankankan [Glenshane], that was guarded with some five troops of horse of Colonel Philip Mac Toul's regiment, Turlough Mac Art Oge's regiment, and General-Major O'Lane's regiment; as also to engage those regiments so as they might not infest Venables at Toome."<sup>21</sup> After that fort was<sup>t</sup>aken Coote posted himself at Dungannon; but, his supplies being cut off by the Irish, he was forced to retire with the main body of his army to Omagh, leaving his own regiment of horse and that of his brother, Captain Chidley Coote, to watch the motions of the Irish, who lay securely encamped near Charlemont. The bishop, hearing that Venables had marched to Coleraine with the view of proceeding by Derry to join Coote, invested Dungiven, which was held by Lieutenant-Colonel Michael Beresford. "Coote sent orders to all the country to put over their goods and remove themselves to the other side of Lough Foyle; by which means the bishop's army was straightened for victuals, and the corn being in the ground the country suffered but little." Though gallantly defended to the last, the castle of Dungiven was taken by storm; that at Ballycastle, near Newtownlimavady, was, "poltroon-like," surrendered; but "Limavady Castle, belonging to Major Philips, was only attempted by menacing parties, Major Philips having resolutely burned all his out-houses, or anything that might advantage the enemy's covert approach,"

Coote, having obtained the necessary assistance at Omagh, despatched Major King with three troops of horse, and Major Reid with three hundred foot, to co-operate with the garrison at Enniskillen in intercepting the supplies of men and provisions which the bishop was expecting from Connaught :—"the master-point being all this while how to work a conjuncture of the Claneboy forces ; for my lord-president resolved, if it could be effected, immediately to put it to a day." An ill-advised movement of the bishop unexpectedly afforded him the desired opportunity. To keep open the communication with Ballyshannon and Connaught, M'Mahon resolved to pass the river Foyle at the ford of Clonleigh,<sup>22</sup> not far from Lifford, which Coote permitted him to effect without molestation. But so soon as the Irish had passed the river, the English general, having previously prepared his men for a rapid movement, hastily marched to "Breagh-dough, another strong pass three miles behind Clanlee—for which pass the Irish strove hard,"<sup>23</sup> as the possession of it cut off their return, and enabled Coote and Venables to effect their long proposed junction. The English succeeded in securing this post, and the bishop, mortified at this successful manœuvre, the result of his own rashness, drew up his men in order of battle, and attempted to regain the pass. A skirmish took place on the 2d of June, in which Captain Tailor of the English dragoons was slain, and Captain Cathcart severely wounded ; but the Irish were compelled to retire "on the mountainest ground they could find" toward Letterkenny, followed by Coote, who declined an engagement till he should be joined by the troops under Venables. On the 18th, the latter, to the number of a thousand, arrived from Coleraine, under the command of Colonel Fenwick,<sup>24</sup> when, understanding that the bishop had

There is a passage called "the Long Causeway," between Derg and Claudy, in the parish of Urney, and an authentic tradition of a severe skirmish having taken place here between the English and Irish in the wars of Cromwell.

<sup>24</sup> Venables, it appears, had gone to Dublin to acquaint the council of officers there sent Colonel Miles Sweeny with a detachment to seize on the castle of Doe and procure provisions, Coote resolved to embrace that opportunity of coming to an engagement. Accordingly, on Friday, the 21st of June, at Schear-Saullis,<sup>25</sup> two miles south-west of Letterkenny, on the river Swilly, both armies engaged. This battle, memorable as the last which occurred in Ulster until the wars of the Revolution, was maintained with desperate valour on both sides for a considerable time. But the Irish, having lost their major-general, O'Cahan, with five colonels and most of their officers, gave way, and were totally routed, leaving their arms, ammunition, baggage, and even their colours upon the field. Of the English there were killed only Major Harry Gore and one captain, with a few officers wounded, but not severely.<sup>26</sup> Sir Phelim O'Neill and Alexander M'Donnell, brother to the Earl of Antrim, succeeded in effecting their escape; but M'Mahon, with a small escort of

of the precarious condition of Coote and his small party in the face of the large army of the Irish.—Nickoll's "State Papers," p. 72.

<sup>25</sup> This is the correct name of the place where the battle was fought, though the "Perfect Relation" calls it Schear-follis, and Cox Skirfolas ii., 25. Until very lately an old castle stood here, which had been one of the residences of the O'Donnells, and commanded the ford of the Swilly [Hibernicè Skear-Swillis] and the narrow gorge leading to Glen-Swilly, but I could scarcely discover any traces of it. Human bones are still occasionally found in repairing the embankments of the river.

<sup>26</sup> An abstract of Coote's account of this sanguinary engagement is given by Whitelocke (pp. 463, 64), by which it appears that the loss of the Irish was very great—amounting to nearly three thousand men. On the 9th of July his letters were read in the parliament, who directed a day of public thanksgiving to be observed for this decisive victory, voted a hundred pounds to Mr. King who brought the news, and ordered a letter of thanks to be written to Sir Charles Coote and his officers, among whom the following were specially noticed:—Col. Fenwick, Col. Richard Coote, Lieutenant-Col. Gore, and Major John King, Major Francis Gore, and Captain Duckenfield.—Conn. Journ., vi., 438. Major King survived the Restoration, when he was created by Charles II. the first Lord Kingston. In Aubrey's "Miscellanies" (8vo, Lond., 1721, pp. 44, 45) is the following account of an apparition which was seen by M'Mahon and some of his officers the night before this eventful battle:—"A woman of uncommon stature, all in white, appearing to the said bishop, admonished him not to cross the river first, to assault the enemy, but suffer them to do it, whereby he should obtain the victory. That, if the Irish took the water first to move towards the English, they should be put to a total rout; which came to pass. O'Cahan and Sir Henry O'Neal, who were both killed there, saw severally the same apparition, and dissuaded the bishop from giving the first onset, but could not prevail upon him."

horse, was pursued by Major King, at the head of a squadron from Enniskillen, who encountered the fugitives on the 25th, and made the bishop his prisoner.

By this victory, the power of the royalists and confederate Irish in Ulster was completely overthrown. The castles of Lifford, Ballycastle, and Dungiven, were abandoned. Coote, having beheaded the captive prelate at Enniskillen, returned to Derry, and placed the head of his victim on one of the gates of the city. Having recruited his victorious troops, he despatched a considerable reinforcement to Venables, who had returned from Coleraine to Carrickfergus, with instructions to invest Charlemont, the only fort which remained in the hands of the Irish. The garrison under Sir Phelim O'Neill, who had made his way thither after the defeat at Letterkenny, defended the place in the most resolute manner against repeated assaults; till being at length reduced to the utmost extremity, they surrendered upon terms, and, in the beginning of August, Venables took formal possession of the fort.<sup>27</sup> The entire province was now prostrate at the feet of the English republic;

<sup>27</sup> The desperate defence made by the garrison, is amply attested by the following extract from a letter of Venables to Cromwell, written immediately after their surrender:—"After our greate victory [at Letterkenny], soe soone as wee could bring ourselves into a posture fitt for a siege wee sett down before Charlemont, wherein haveing made our approaches, wee presently battered the same, but found it stronger than expected, and soe were forced to send for more powder and ball, and the gunns being within forty or fifty yards of the wall; which being done, wee fell to our former taske againe, and conceiving the breach assaultable we fell on, but weare repulsed with the losse of forty men, whereof five were captains, besides inferiour officers, and about two hundred and fifty wounded. After which repulse wee continued the myne formerly begunne and almost perfected, and a running trench by which wee intended to putt a gallery over their graffe. Finding our batteries could not worke the said effect, wee weare induced to follow this course, which whyle we weare prosecuting the enemy sounded a parly, and wee consented to it, and immediately agreed upon the surrender of the place, whereof we are now in possession; and have since found that in the storme they lost all their officers except Sir Philome himself and two lieutenants. These lost about fifty men, and wee lost about seaventy. Little ammunicon found; onely one barrel of powder, sixty coves and oxen, with some salt, salmond, and butter, soe that wee conceive they might have houlden out three weekes or a month longer."—Nickoli's "State Papers," p. 83. This letter is without a date, and the editor conjectures it was written in 1651; but this is an error, as it was manifestly written in August, 1650. See Whitelocke, 467—469.

and Coote and Venables, thus victorious over its enemies, were ill prepared to brook any longer the opposition of the Presbytery to their usurped authority.

One of the first measures of the parliament, after the execution of the King and abolition of the House of Lords, was to frame an oath called the ENGAGEMENT, in which all persons were required to swear to be "faithful to the commonwealth of England as now established, without a king or house of lords."* No one was admitted to any public office or place of trust who had not taken this oath, and their several commanders were required to administer it to all under their authority. So soon, therefore, as Venables had fixed his residence at Carrickfergus, he proceeded to impose this oath on his officers and soldiers, and on the chief magistrates of the towns within his quarters, and to invite the several ministers around him to enter into it without delay. The latter at once refused to take the oath; but, owing to their popularity and influence in the country, and his apprehensions of the royalist party, not at that time subdued, he forbore to press it on them, or to notice this refusal to acknowledge the authority of the new republic.<sup>28</sup> But when that party were on the eve of being driven out of the province, probably urged on by the Independents, he began to deal less favourably with the ministers. The following narrative of his proceedings, and of their able and resolute defence of their conduct,

[* The following is a copy of the Engagement:—"I —— do hereby declare that I do renounce the pretended title of Charles Stewart, and the whole line of the late King James, and every other person, as a single person, pretending to the government of these nations of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and the dominions and territories thereunto belonging, and that I will, by the grace of the Almighty God, be true, faithful, and constant to this commonwealth, against any king, single person, or House of Peers, and every of them, and hereunto I subscribe my name."]

<sup>28</sup> By a letter from Edinburgh, it appears that, even so early as the beginning of February, 1650, some proceedings had been taken against the ministers. "From Dublin, by letters of February 15, we hear —— that in the north of Ireland, the engagement is vehemently persist, and some of the ministers imprisoned." Nickoll's "State Papers," p. 4.

was drawn up by them at the time, and has been happily preserved :—<sup>29</sup>

“The sectaries, although they might, yet they did not at the first publicly disturb the ministers, notwithstanding of their free preaching against their courses, till once they had the enemy without sufficiently subdued, and these people within taught to carry their yoke.

“After they had found themselves in a tolerable posture, they began most cunningly to loaden the ministry with reproaches (else their malice and purpose of persecution could not have been well enough conveyed); for, say they, ‘the ministers are bloody men—they are seditious—they keep a distance between you and us, meaning the country, else your burdens would not lye so heavy upon you—they, in their preaching and praying, are guilty of treason against the State.’ Then begun they in their councils to advise what course was fittest to be taken with these men; and it was thought fit that summons should be issued for them, commanding them to appear before Colonel Venables at the army at Dromore. The first summons came to us [met in Presbytery at Bangor] about four hours before the hour of our appearing: whereupon, not long after, second summons were sent. These peremptory summons sent to them before that they had called them to a conference, or had desired that the question should be disputed for the satisfaction of conscience, seemed very strange unto the ministers. Besides, understanding of the threatening expressions that had passed from many of them, and the particular carriage of some formerly who had publicly drawn in soldiers into sundry churches, and opposed the ministers, yea publicly reviled them with base words; also the very day before the

[second] summons came they had apprehended Mr. John Drysdall, minister of Portaferry, by a band of near eighty dragoons :—all those and sundry other considerations moved the ministers to write back in answer to these summons ; and desire a safe conduct that so they might without trouble go and return. Instead of the safe conduct, a party was presently sent to bring every minister by violence ; these of the county of Antrim to Carrickfergus, and those of the county of Down to Belfast.

“Of the ministers of the county of Down, beside Mr. Drysdall formerly apprehended, were taken Mr. James Baty [or Bautie], minister at Ballywalter, and Mr. Fergus Alexander, minister at Greyabbey. Of these in the county of Antrim were apprehended Mr. Henry Main, minister at Islemagee, and carried to the common prison of Carrickfergus. Master Archibald Ferguson, Mr. David Buttle, Mr. Anthony Kennedy, also were taken, yet were permitted to stay in their own houses till Colonel Venables came from the army ; at which time we were all to be brought before him. As for the rest of the ministers, they were upon their keeping ; some fled to the woods, and some to Scotland, or hid themselves. Those of the county of Down were brought to Belfast, and were imprisoned in a lodging where none of the Lord’s people durst come to visit them, nor hear them preach, nor join with them in prayer: the heathen did not deal so with the Apostle Paul. (Acts xxviii., 30, 31.) After sixteen days’ imprisonment of Mr. Drysdall and ten of the rest, Colonel Venables came from the army to Carrickfergus, whither we were sent to observe his further pleasure.

“By the way, it is to be observed that when he had understood of the flight of the ministers, and their fears of his violence, a little to mitigate the matter, he sent this ensuing paper to Mr. Ferguson and Mr. Kennedy, upon a letter of theirs desiring their not imprisonment till he himself should come along to Carrickfergus, at which time they promised to come to him:—‘WHEREAS, the ministers of the county of Down and Antrim have been summoned to appear in a fair way before me, and have some jealousies and suspicions, as I conceive, that I intended by that summons to have entrapped them, and to have taken advantage of them had they come: THIS is to assure them that if they come and give me under their hand that they will not, for time to come, in their sermons and prayers, nor in any other private conferences with the people, move them to sedition or trouble, or touch upon any other thing of State matters than what is allowed by the state of England, that they shall have free liberty to depart from me again to their several places of abode and charges, and to use their ministerial functions: And, that, although at their being with me they shall not be convinced to give this engagement, yet if they engage that they will depart this province and repair to Scotland within ten days, wind and weather serving, they shall have free liberty to do the same, and to depart on these terms also without confinement or restraint: ALL WHICH I promise under my hand this 16th day of June, 1650. R. Venables.’

“As you may perceive by this paper, the question was propounded to the seven ministers, ‘Whether they would forbear preaching or conference in public and in private against the present power and state of England, except with such limitations as were then propounded?’ unto which the ministers returned this following answer in writing, subscribed by their hands, entitled, ‘Reasons why in conscience we cannot condescend unto the command of Colonel Robert Venables in that kind to give obedience thereunto.’

“First, it is said by Colonel Venables—you are subjects to the kingdom of Ireland, which is a kingdom belonging to England; ought you not therefore to obey the acts of the parliament of England who have, by act of parliament, adjudged it high treason if any man shall own monarchicall government by king or house of lords, and have commanded under a penalty to subscribe an engagement to be faithful unto the government now established without king or house of lords.

“To this we answer, that we acknowledge ourselves to be subjects of the kingdom of Ireland, and that Ireland is subordinate unto England. But it was objected that now they were come in by the sword as conquerors, and the sword must be the law. To this we answer, that there is a necessity of passive obedience in their power, though we do not acknowledge their authority. But certainly those who are conquered must, or at least ought to be, made acquainted with the laws of the conqueror by public proclamation, and not receive them from every private soldier or colonel in an army. Besides, by two several declarations, Colonel Venables spoke to the people in this corner in another strain; wherein are these words, that ‘he was come to deliver the well-affected in the country and the ministry from the power of malignants;’ so that we are amazed why he now speaks to us in a dialect so far different, and he knew as well then in what we were well-affected as now.

“But grant that the kingdom of Ireland were immediately subjected unto the laws of the parliament of England, and that we in conscience were bound to obey the laws of the parliament of England (which we for our own parts have been most ready to do always since these troubles, and do sincerely profess that we are all cordially and willingly subject unto the lawful authority of the kingdom of England as ever we were, and do resolve by the strength of God to continue constant); yet we must be convinced that that power which now rules in England is the lawful parliamentary authority of that kingdom.

“To this Colonel Venables answers, that they call themselves so. To this we answer, that it seems to us a strange assertion that they are a parliament, because they say so; or a power, because they place power in themselves. Can men be the authors and founders of a new authority in themselves? Kings and other magistrates are called the ordinance of man, because they are put into their offices by men; but can the same person be the creator and the creature? Again, it seems to be more strange to us, for it overturns the very foundations of order and right government. For men are called to the magistracy by the suffrage of the people whom they govern; and for men to assume unto themselves power is mere tyranny and unjust usurpation.

“But it may be said that the parliament are called by the people. We indeed conceive that the first parliament which was made up of the three estates were orderly, in their members being elected and appointed by the people according to law. But we would fain understand the nature of this government. At first sight it looks like a democracy. Yet we conceive that, in a democracy, the power of government is either in the collective body of the people, or in some elected by them and entrusted therewith. But neither have the people assumed government in their own hands since the dissolution of the old government by king, lords, and commons, neither have they elected any new delegates.

“But we cannot be persuaded that this can be the parliament of England, it looks so unlike it, for these reasons:—We who are now accused by you were formerly called the friends of the parliament of England; and we are in nothing changed from the men we were at that very time. We walk upon those very same principles, we preach those very same things; so that surely if this were the parliament of England we would continue in their favour. Besides, the parliament of England and their armies called us of the Scots nation their brethren; their armies and ours were one; they lived and suffered together as brethren. But we are now by your soldiers called ‘seditious fellows;’ our nation is styled ‘a base and treacherous nation, which you will ere long make a province of;’ our oaths are no more accounted than ‘the bark of a dog.’ All these do evidently hold forth to us that this is not the parliament of England.

“But it was objected by Colonel Venables that the house was purged, for there was discovered therein a faction that carried on the King’s interest without regard to the public good or liberty of the subject. They were purged, indeed, and so purged that the very soul, essence, and being of a parliament were purged from them; and nothing left but some few, even the lesser part of the House of Commons. Moreover, when the King, in the sitting down of the last parliament, offered to infringe the liberties and privileges of the parliament by secluding [only five] of the members, how was it by these men cried out upon who now themselves have so violated the privileges of parliament, that they have cut off two integral parts [the king and the lords,] and the greater part of the third estate of the whole parliament. We cannot, then, in reason say there is any parliament now sitting in England unto whom obedience is due.

“But let us go further, and grant that those men were a parliament; then, whether or not ought we to obey this command in submitting to their authority without king and house of lords? Ought we to forbear preaching, praying, or conference in public or in private, except with the limitations propounded by Colonel Venables? We cannot, neither as we are subjects, nor as we are Christians, nor as we are ministers of the Gospel.

“As subjects we cannot, because we are under the moral tie unto a former established government by king, lords, and commons. Now ‘no man can serve two masters;’ therefore we cannot be subject both to the one and the other. And we conceive that this is the only true established authority, as we have shewed formerly.

“As Christians we cannot, because we are sworn and covenanted unto that relation, both in the oath of allegiance unto his majesty, the supreme magistrate in these three kingdoms; and in the Solemn League and Covenant, wherein we are solemnly engaged to maintain and defend these interests, which this engagement takes away; and because by so doing we should offend against all these Scriptures—1 Tim. v. 22; Eph. v. 7, 11; Isa. v. 20—4; 2 Cor. vi. 14; 2 Tim. iii. 2—5; Prov. xvii. 15. But may ye not engage a non-acting against or a permissive sufferance of this power? We deny not but unto an usurped power there may be, in some cases and for some reasons, a present passive submission in our own temporal things; but to engage for time to come not to appear against it cannot be justified. For, by so doing, we wrong others with whom we are bound in solemn covenant, in binding up our hands from their assistance in point of justice against usurpers. And if lawful authority have a door opened for the restoration thereof, we make ourselves unable to do our duty before God and man unto the lawful magistrate.

“As ministers of the Gospel we cannot; because, of all others, ministers of the Gospel are most strictly obliged to shew opposition to sinful courses, and to study the advancement of equity in their places and stations—2 Cor. x. 4, 5; Isa. lviii. 1. But what have ministers to do with State matters? Let them preach Jesus Christ, and not meddle with other things which do not concern them. We take no pleasure to move without our own sphere; neither, through the strength of God, resolve we to meddle in State matters, further than it becometh ministers of the Gospel. For we deal not as statesmen in State matters, but only bewail the enormities in them, and witness against their evil. And, in so far as they fall under theological rules and evangelical doctrines, we dare not restrain ourselves, but as watchmen set the trumpet to our mouth and cry aloud, and not fear.”

This firm yet temperate defence of their refusal to take the engagement, reflecting, as it does, the highest credit on the talents, firmness, and loyalty of the ministers, proved wholly unavailing. On the faith of the safe-conduct which Venables had previously granted, they were permitted to return to their charges unmolested ; but they were plainly informed, that, “since they would not engage to carry themselves submissively to the present government, they must be gone ; and that they could expect no favour from them.”<sup>30</sup> This intimation of approaching difficulties was confirmed by a Declaration which Sir Charles Coote published in the month of August, immediately after the final reduction of the province by the surrender of Charlemont. In this public document, while he bears an indirect but ample testimony to the unwavering attachment of the ministers to constitutional principles, he thus distinctly forewarns them they should be no longer tolerated.<sup>31</sup> “As to the ministers, we declare we are heartily sorry that we should be inforced to that irreverence, we seriously acknowledge, to persons of their function. But when, after several admonitions, private and public intimations, if they would adhere to their former dispensation of the Word, without these frequent oblique calumnies upon that government and power under which they live, rather giving the children stones than bread, and instead of edification of souls seeking the subversion and ruin of the State, and fomenting such distempers among ourselves that cannot probably (if way were given unto it) but draw us into factions, diversities of interests, and so terminate in blood : We say out of the duty we owe to God in preserving that peace we enjoy amongst one another, and for preventing such misreports as some would charge us withal, out of the relation we stand in to the present government that they would undermine, we must use all means to silence all such incendiary instruments, we being yet scarcely whole of those deadly wounds this country received by the like contumelious practices ; till which, as in all sincerity we declare and desire it may be received in as friendly a belief."

In October following, an unpropitious change for the Presbyterians took place in the administration of the affairs of Ireland, by the appointment of new commissioners ; Cromwell, though now employed in Scotland, being still continued in the office of lord-lieutenant, and Henry Ireton, his son-in-law, being constituted his lord-deputy. To these commissioners another Independent teacher, Mr. Samuel Winter, minister at Cottingham, in Yorkshire, was appointed chaplain ; he was soon after made provost of Trinity College, and resided there constantly till ejected at the Restoration. He also officiated at St. Nicholas' Church in the city. One of the "Instructions" given them was, to afford all due encouragement, and to appoint a competent maintenance, "by way of stipend out of the public revenue,"—not however for ministers, whom it was now the evidence of superior light to decry, but—"for all such persons of pious life and conversation as they shall find qualified with gifts for the preaching of the Gospel:"<sup>32</sup> at the same time they were directed to put in execution all orders of parliament against not only popish recusants, but against "all delinquent and scandalous ministers." In consequence of the proceedings of the Scots, by whom Charles II., after solemnly swearing the Covenant, had been crowned at Scone on the 1st of January, 1651, the Presbyterians of Ulster were looked upon with increased jealousy, and their conduct vigilantly observed, lest the interest of their national sovereign should be revived by them in Ireland. The ministers were, in a particular manner, subjected to rigorous treatment. They were violently excluded from their pulpits, their subsistence was withdrawn, they were in continual danger of being apprehended and imprisoned; and at a council of war, held at Carrickfergus in March, 1651, which was attended by Sir Charles Coote, with Colonels Venables, Chidley Coote, and Robert Barrow, a formal act of banishment from the kingdom was passed against them.<sup>33</sup> The engagement was also pressed on all classes throughout the country. Commissioners visited almost every parish, and the inhabitants, upon summons, were required to appear before them, and take this obnoxious oath. And though the council of war had not yet decided what course to pursue with respect to the numbers who refused to swear, due notice was in the mean time taken of them, and threats of heavy penalties were freely denounced against them.

<sup>32</sup> These instructions are given at length in the Commons' Journals, vi., 479. One of their earliest orders respecting ministers was the following:—"Dublin Castle, 22d August, 1651. Ordered, that the commissioners of revenue at Dublin do forthwith inquire what stipends and tythes or other maintenance do belong to the ministers within the several parishes in the city of Dublin, and do certify the same to the commissioners of parliament ; and they are likewise to provide two convenient houses belonging to the commissioners, for the pleasant accommodation of Mr. Rogers and Mr. Wyke, and their families."—MS. extracts from the council books of Ireland, for which I am indebted to the kindness of Sir William Betham, Bart., Ulster King-at-arms. The other Independent ministers in Dublin at this period, besides Mr. Winter and Messrs. Rogers and

At this gloomy period of the history of the Church died one of her most zealous and upright office-bearers, Major Edmond Ellis. He was among the first elders who were ordained by the Rev. Anthony Kennedy after his settlement at Temple-

Wyke, were Mr. Wilkinson, Mr. Hooke, Mr. Huggins, and Mr. Chambers. Five of these were empowered, by order of the commissioners, dated December 15, 1651, "to take care that the Gospel be preached at St. Patrick's church in Dublin every Lord's-day, by themselves or others, until Mr. Chambers shall return; he being now appointed with the commissioners into Connaught."—MS. ext., ut supra.

patrick, in the end of the year 1646,<sup>34</sup> and was one of that rare class of Christian soldiers, of whom many had been employed in Ireland. After reluctantly surrendering Carrickfergus to the royalists under Lord Montgomery in 1649, he appears to have retired to Templepatrick, where he died in the midst of his family, bewailed by his friends and deeply lamented by the Church, on Wednesday, the 11th of June, the day after the engagement, to which he was strongly opposed, had been tendered at Antrim to the adjoining parishes. Through all the difficulties and vicissitudes of those trying times he was a consistent Presbyterian, and a truly eminent Christian. Several of his devout sayings on his death-bed, which have been preserved, are worthy of being recorded, as affording a specimen of the religious sentiments and feelings of the Presbyterian eldership at this period.<sup>35</sup>

In consequence of the strictness with which the engagement

<sup>34</sup> Mr. Kennedy, as the reader has seen (p. 41, antea), was ordained on the 30th of October, 1640; and, on the 22nd of November following, fourteen elders and four deacons were "publicly admitted and sworn with prayer and fasting." The first two names are Major Edmond Ellis and Lieutenant James Lindsay. The following regulations, agreed upon by the session shortly after their appointment, will give an idea of the state of discipline at this period, and of the strict manner in which it was administered:—"It is enacted by the session of Templepatrick: First, That all complaints come into the session by way of bill: the complaintive is to put in one shilling with his bill, and if he proves not his point, his shilling forfeits to the session-book. This is done to prevent groundless scandal. Second, That all beer-sellers that sell best beer, especially in the night-time, till people be drunk, shall be censured. Third, That if parents let their children vague or play on the Lord's-day, they shall be censured as profaners of the Sabbath. Fourth, That all persons, standing in the public place of repentance, shall pay the church-officer one groat. Fifth, That no children be baptised till the parents who present them come to some of the elders and get their children's names registered, that the elders may testify of them to the minister." It was subsequently enacted (Dec. 28, 1647), "That if there be any misdemeanour, as drunkenness or squabbling, at bridals, besides the censures the persons themselves come under who commit the abuse, the persons married shall forfeit their privileges." The first communion administered at Templepatrick, after Mr. Kennedy's ordination, was on the 4th of July, 1647; forty pottles of the best claret were used, indicating a very large attendance of communicants. The first censure on record is—"That John Cowan shall stand opposite the pulpit, and confess his sin, in the face of the public, of beating his wife on the Lord's-day."

was pressed, and the rigorous proceedings of the council of war against the ministers, many of them were compelled to abandon the country. A few, unwilling to leave their people at this perplexing crisis, ventured to remain, notwithstanding the serious privations to which they were exposed. "Those that staid in the country, though they could not exercise their ministry orderly as formerly, and though their stipends were sequestered, yet they, changing their apparel to the habit of countrymen, travelled in their own parishes frequently, and sometimes in other places, taking what opportunities they could to preach in the fields, or in barns and glens; and were seldom in their own houses. They persuaded the people to constancy in the received doctrines, in opposition to the wild heresies which were then spreading, and reminding them of their duty to their lawful magistrates, the King and parliament, in opposition to the usurpation of the times; and in their public prayers always mentioning the lawful magistrate.

"This continued throughout the summer of 1651; at which time there was diligent search made anew for them. Some were again taken, others fled; and those who were taken were imprisoned first, for a time, in Carrickfergus, in lodgings where they quartered; and thereafter, Colonel Venables not gaining any ground upon them, they were sent to Scotland, where all of them were invited to parishes, and exercised their ministry for about three years in divers places of Scotland, and were admitted as members of the presbyteries where their congregations were: and withal they reserved a liberty to return to their places in Ireland, if ever God should open a door. Those remaining in the country, and not apprehended, being only about six or seven, were Messrs. Thomas Peebles, James Gordon, and Gilbert Ramsay, in the county of Down; and Messrs. Anthony Kennedy, Robert Cunningham, and Patrick Adair, in the county of Antrim. These were now put to greater difficulties than before, being more earnestly searched after than in their houses; yet they continued preaching in remote or private places, where the people willingly met them. They had frequent meetings among themselves in order to strengthening one another, and consulting of their present carriage; and they drew up causes of fasts and humiliations to be kept among the people in a private way, in several little societies, as the times permitted. Sometimes the minister would in his parish call them all together a part of the day, and preach and pray with them; and thereafter the people would repair to their several societies for prayer the rest of the day, the minister always joining with one of these little societies after another. This continued for another year; at which time the people were discouraged through want of the public ordinances. The ministers also wearied, and ceased their manner of living and preaching: and indeed it appeared that these small endeavours of an oppressed people and remnant of the ministry were not in vain, for after this matters began to grow more encouraging. For it was a holy Providence thus ordered it.

“It was before recorded, that two of the Presbytery had been suspended about three years before, for their declining to read the Presbytery’s Representation against the sectarian party. And they continuing obstinate in their opinion against the Presbytery, when that party commanded in the country, these brethren were much encouraged by them, and not only had the liberty of their ministry, but considerable salaries. They met along with some ministers belonging to the army, whereof Timothy Taylor, an Independent, was the chief both for power, parts, learning, and gravity. They had also meeting with them some old curates who had now fallen in with Mr. Taylor, and some others who were rather of Anabaptistical principles. These two brethren, together with another, Mr. Thomas Vesey, who now followed their way, and was minister of Coleraine, remembering the sweet society they sometimes had had with their own brethren of their principles, and now beginning to discern that party better, and having compassion on their brethren, whose bodies and spirits were much spent with tossing in the country, they made a motion to Mr. Taylor to desire a conference with these few brethren in the country, in order to a right understanding between him and them; which he and the rest with him accorded unto.

"They, therefore, wrote a letter to the brethren of the Presbytery [in December] in which, after fair and brotherly language, they invite the brethren to appoint a time and place of meeting with them, when they should spend one day in fasting and prayer, in order to a right understanding among them in matters of controversy relating both to the commonwealth and other matters; and thereafter that they should immediately fall upon an amicable brotherly conference upon these matters, to give or receive satisfaction: and the commissioners of the revenue who then governed the country, whereof Colonel Venables was one, being made acquainted with this proposal, they promised a safe conduct, that if there were no agreement these ministers should be 'in statu quo prius.' This letter was sent by Mr. Jeremiah O'Quin, to be delivered to Mr. Anthony Kennedy, of Templepatrick, and he was commissioned to confer with him anent the time and place of their meeting. But Mr. Jeremy could not find any one in Templepatrick, though the place where he was bred, where he before had been in great reputation and had much acquaintance, to tell him where he might find Mr. Kennedy; wherefore he was forced to leave the letter to its venture. It came, however, to the brethren's hands, upon which they met together; and after consultation with prayer to God, they resolved they would not nor could not meet these brethren 'primo instante' in the exercise of fasting and prayer till they knew them better. Some of them they had never seen, and were of principles professedly contrary,<sup>7</sup> others of them, being under censure of the Presbytery yet untaken off, they would not countenance at all. However, they wrote a letter back declaring they were willing to meet with Mr. Taylor and Mr. Weeks,<sup>36</sup> two ministers of the army, and confer with them. They named the day and place, at Antrim in March, 1652, which was near four months after the date of their letter.

"These ministers having received the letter which intimated the day and place, they gathered together all they could persuade who were inclining toward their way of Independency or Anabaptism, in the whole county of Antrim; and the brethren who had fallen from the Presbytery came along with them. Though Thursday was the day appointed, they met there on Tuesday, and kept Wednesday wholly in public preaching in the church. On Thursday morning there was preaching also, and a very throng congregation. The seven brethren of the Presbytery, being near Antrim on Wednesday at night, came into the town on Thursday morning; and finding there was preaching in the church, they also went in among the crowd. It was Mr. Weeks that was preaching. This gentleman perceiving these ministers coming in, he immediately in discourse to the people did indirectly reflect on them as troublers of the country and dividers of God's people; but there he did profess they would be forced to stop, alleging to the people Rev. iii. 9. This was the first entertainment these ministers got instead of their brotherly conference. But immediately after ending the sermon and prayer they had another 'salve,' which was somewhat affronting and very surprising to them. The people were warned by the same Mr. Weeks to be present in the hall at the castle immediately after dinner, to hear a dispute between these gentlemen (as he called the ministers present and now in the eye of the people) and us, meaning Mr. Taylor and himself. At this time neither himself nor Mr. Taylor had ever seen these ministers, nor they them; nor had ever any intercourse but that one letter before mentioned. But Mr. Taylor hearing these were young men, and knowing himself to be of a considerable standing, and not unlearned; and long before this having put forth a book in print in vindication of Independency,<sup>37</sup> he thought to surprise the young country men and affront them before the people as not able to defend their cause; and bring the Independent way into credit in the country in opposition to the Presbytery. Mr. Weeks concurred with him thus far; but being an Anabaptist he had a further design than Mr. Taylor, but was much more unable to follow it, being void of human learning, never educated that way, but a tradesman and imprudent.

“After the summons to a public dispute before the people, unexpected by the ministers, coming out of the church they met Mr. Taylor and Mr. Weeks at the door, and saluted each other without more words; but they refused to take by the hand those brethren who had fallen from the Presbytery and were now joined with the sectaries. Instead of going to dinner, however, they went together to a room in a private house with some few of their friends who had been present at that sermon, to consider what to do, and they resolved not to dispute. After the two brethren [Taylor and Weeks] had dined in the castle, they sent one to the ministers to desire them to come to the dispute. The people were now gathered; and indeed the people, having such public warning upon such an unusual occasion, did readily throng into the place. The brethren returned an answer they could not dispute, but were willing to discourse with Mr. Taylor and Mr. Weeks, according to their own proposal, in private. They replied, there must be a dispute since the people were advertised ; otherwise they would publicly declare to the people that the ministers would not defend their own cause.

“ However, the ministers went down to the castle, and had first a meeting with the two brethren in a chamber, and discoursed with them of the unreasonableness and unfairness of their carriage, thus to take advantage and bring men to a dispute, not only without any previous warning of any such thing, but who knew not so much as what should be the subject-matter of their dispute. They desired only that they might agree upon the points in debate, and let them be now formed into theses, and they were willing to debate with them to-morrow morning. But nothing would do save a present dispute, as the people were gathered, and would, without that, be disappointed. They would dispute on nothing but what they commonly taught and owned. And so they went down stairs to the common hall, where the people were gathered very throng, and where were a long table and forms set for the ministers, and a chair at the upper end of it. There Masters Taylor and Weeks sat down, and cheerfully looked to one another. They spake to the people saying—‘It seems these gentlemen will not come to dispute and defend their cause.’ Meantime the brethren staid in the chamber, and those who had joined with the sectaries staid with them, persuading them to that dispute, and telling them there was no fear. Yea, Mr. Jeremy O’Quin offered himself to undertake it, if the brethren would allow him. In the meantime one of their friends came up and besought them as they regarded the credit of the profession, to go down and answer those men ; for they were triumphing. Upon this message the brethren, without any further deliberation or discourse, hastened to the place : and one of them, Mr. Patrick Adair, whom the rest had been speaking of among themselves to entertain this debate, and who had entertained most of the discourse in the chamber, did, with a kind of animosity and resolution unusual to him, step into the chair and set himself down there, Messrs. Taylor and Weeks sitting below upon a form. On this Mr. Taylor made a motion to Mr. Weeks that a brother should pray before the dispute begun, which Mr. Weeks motioned to the brother in the chair. Mr. Adair readily yielded to the motion and prayed, and then set himself down in the chair, waiting what further step the brethren would make toward the dispute.

“Mr. Taylor then rose up and delivered before the people a discourse elaborate enough, and cunningly contrived to commend Independency and disgrace Presbyterian government. In this he stated the question between the one and the other, made the Independent opinions more plausible to the common people, as to the constitution of their church members, their tenderness in their walk, the freedom of God’s people in that way without anything like tyranny over their consciences, not measuring their congregations by mearings of land, but by godliness, not taking in all the promiscuous multitude to be partakers of all ordinances, &c., &c. After Mr. Taylor had thus discoursed for near to an hour, he sat himself down, and said no more. Upon this, the brother who sat in the chair [Mr. Adair] rose up, and first spoke to the people, declaring the occasion of our coming there; that it was upon a brotherly letter from those gentlemen, pointing at Messrs. Taylor and Weeks, to a private and amicable conference, which now they of themselves, without their consent, had turned to a public dispute; that they knew not what should be the matter of their debate till now; and that therefore they were not fitted to dispute upon such weighty matters off hand, especially with such a grave man as Mr. Taylor. But as Providence seemed to call them to say something for presbyterial government, and the constitution of our churches in opposition to the Independent way, they would now, as they could, answer what Mr. Taylor had said: and they besought the people, if their cause were not well managed by them, not to attribute it to the weakness of the cause, but to theirs, and partly also to that indirect way which had been taken with them to come to a public dispute.

“Upon which Mr. Adair then turned to Mr. Taylor and told him, that, not having known what should be the ground of his discourse before he heard it, and having no theses from him to found a debate on, he could not so exactly mention all that Mr. Taylor had said: only some few heads he observed, and mentioned them. The first and principal being anent the constituent members of theirs and our churches, they were for visible saints, or such as in ground of charity had positive holiness—we took in all those who were willing to profess the truth, and be subject to Christ’s ordinances. And thus, Mr. Adair laboured to overthrow Mr. Taylor’s pious-like opinion; and evidenced the way of constituting the visible Church, not only by the constant practice of all the Churches of Christ since the Apostles’ times, except Donatists, Anabaptists, &c., but also by the way of constituting churches both under the Old and New Testaments; wherein Mr. Adair instanced the first church formed by Moses, thereafter in the times of David and the prophets. Mr. Taylor gave some answer to these instances, which were readily replied unto; the truth is, Mr. Taylor did not speak much after this elaborate discourse. Mr. Adair, who most spoke to him, being irritated by his unfair carriage and drawing them to a dispute under so much disadvantage, spoke with a confidence and animosity which Mr. Taylor expected not from a youth otherwise not endued with that gift. But it was owned by Mr. Adair to be more God’s special hand at that time giving light and courage, than any personal ability in himself. Thereafter another brother began to debate the business with Mr. Taylor a little between themselves more quietly. And in the meantime Mr. Weeks pro-

poned an argument to Mr. Adair in a direct syllogism, which was easily answered by a distinction to which Mr. Weeks had no reply; nor did he propose another argument, for he had not been taught syllogisms. When he became mute, Mr. Taylor turned from the other brother with whom he had been discoursing, and said to Weeks, 'What is become of your argument, brother?' After this Mr. Weeks looked angry and bashful, but gave no answer. At this Mr. Taylor again proposed that one should pray. He himself being desired to do so by the brother who had prayed before, he prayed, and therein gave thanks to God for the moderation that had appeared in that debate. He seemed to take the brethren's carriage well, and so they parted. But those who favoured that way, who had been brought there of purpose to hear the brethren of the Presbytery affronted and disputed out of their principles, declared much dissatisfaction with Mr. Taylor's management, and said he had lost his cause. The people who favoured the poor ministers returned much confirmed and rejoicing. One of them, a very pious gentleman, said to Mr. Adair, that when he heard Mr. Taylor's first discourse, wherein he set forth the Independent way with all its seeming advantages, he was like to be taken, till he heard those pious-like pretences answered from Scripture, and the constitution of God's Church opened both under the Old and New Testament.

"The brethren, having a safe-conduct sent them in order to this meeting with the other ministers, parted fairly with them. They ventured to return to their congregations more confidently and openly than before, no man forbidding, for a little time. This little respite, as a fruit of God's special providence, and the news of this dispute went to Scotland and reached the brethren there. Shortly after [in June] there came over Mr. Archibald Ferguson, minister of Antrim, who had a letter from Venables upon a request by my Lady Clotworthy, mother to Sir John Clotworthy, a worthy matron, and who with her whole family had been of a long time not only favourers but avowed friends of the way of God. Mr. Andrew Stewart, minister of Donaghadee, being then in Galloway, judged it also his duty to venture to give his congregation here a visit, and came over when he heard that Mr. Ferguson had been sent for."<sup>38</sup>

While the ministers were enjoying this short respite, another change took place in the members of the Irish government. In the previous November, Ireton, Cromwell's son-in-law, died at Limerick; and, in his room, Lieutenant-General Fleetwood, who had married his widow, was, on the 9th of July, appointed commander-in-chief of the forces, and one of the commissioners for the civil affairs of the kingdom. In the following month, new "Instructions," not differing essentially from those previously in force, were drawn up by the parliament for the guidance of the commissioners, who were, at the same time, continued in office for two years longer.<sup>39</sup> One of their first measures was to constitute a court of justice for the trial of all those, whether Romanists or Protestants, who had been concerned in the murders which had disgraced the first breaking out of the Rebellion. This court, whose jurisdiction and authority were distinctly defined,<sup>40</sup> sat for the first time at Kilkenny on the 4th of October. Thence the justices and commissioners proceeded to Waterford, Cork, and Limerick; afterwards to Galway, where they sat in the month of December ; and subsequently into Ulster, in the principal towns of which they held their court during the early part of the year 1653, taking numerous depositions respecting the murders committed by both the conflicting parties, and binding over the deponents to prosecute the delinquents at the next Assizes for each county.<sup>41</sup> In the month of February, 1653, the court sat in Dublin, under the presidency of the Lord Chief-Justice Lowther, when the notorious Sir Phelim O'Neill, who had been taken prisoner by Lord Caulfield in Ulster a few weeks previously, was tried, found guilty, and executed. About two hundred criminals, it is alleged, suffered in the various provinces by the sentence of this court of justice.<sup>42</sup>

Of the commissioners who now administered the affairs of Ireland, the majority were decided adherents of the Baptist portion of the sectaries. Several preachers of that rising sect had been already introduced into Ireland, who propagated their peculiar tenets with intolerant zeal, and spread dissension among the Independent Churches wherever they settled. Among these, the most forward was Mr. Thomas Patient, who had accompanied Cromwell's army as one of its chaplains, and resided at head-quarters, at Kilkenny, in 1650, and at Waterford during the following year.<sup>43</sup> In January, 1652, the Baptists of the latter city wrote to the friends of their cause in Dublin, urging them to withdraw from the ministry of Mr. John Rogers, who presided over an Independent Church erected in the preceding October, and exhorting them to hold communion with those only who had received adult baptism. This letter is signed by Patient and twelve others, and effected a breach in Mr. Rogers' church which worshipped stately in

He is described as an Anabaptist and notorious "fifth-monarchy man;"<sup>45</sup> but, though adopting the political principles by which the Baptists were then distinguished, he certainly, when in Dublin, opposed their characteristic dogmas on the subject of baptism. In a singular work which he published in May, 1653, after he left Dublin, he records the experiences—some of them sufficiently fanatical—of nearly forty individuals, of whom the half were females, who had joined his church in the metropolis. Among these are the experiences of Thomas Huggins and John Bywater, preachers of the Gospel, publicly detailed at St. Bride's Church in October, 1651; and of Colonel Hewson, the governor of Dublin, Major Manwaring, and several other officers of the army.<sup>46</sup> Not long after the arrival of Mr. Rogers another Independent teacher of considerable promise, Mr. John Murcot, settled in Ireland. He had been minister in Cheshire, where he had probably been known to Mr. Taylor, of Carrickfergus. Through the influence of the latter, in the year 1651, he received an invitation "under many hands" to settle with the army at Belfast; but he preferred proceeding to Dublin, where he arrived in the end of that year.<sup>47</sup> He was

Dr. Winter attended him on his death-bed, and preached his funeral sermon in presence of Fleetwood and the council of state, with the mayor and civic authorities. He was buried in St. Mary's.

afterwards directed to accompany the commissioners of the parliament in a visit which they paid to Cork in April, 1653.<sup>48</sup> Here he remained during two months, and was the means of inducing a Mr. Joseph Eyres to become minister of Christ Church in that city, in addition to two others, Dr. Edward Worth and Mr. Hackett, previously settled there or in the neighbourhood. While in Cork, Mr. Murcot and Dr. Worth were challenged by a Doctor Harding, a Baptist preacher residing at Bandon, to a public disputation on the subject of infant baptism, which took place on Thursday, the 26th of May, 1653.<sup>49</sup> In this year it appears that Baptist Churches, though consisting of very few members, had been organised at Dublin, Kilkenny, Wexford, Clonmel, Waterford, Cork, with some friends at Bandon and Kinsale, Limerick, Kerry, and Galway. They had as yet made little progress in Ulster; the only notice of their adherents there being the following:—"In the north, near Carrickfergus, are several lately received by Brother Read, who were baptized by Brother Patient, who we understand are valuable, but want some able brethren to establish them."<sup>50</sup>

<sup>48</sup> The order of council for his proceeding to Cork is dated April 14, 1653; the following is a copy of it:—"It is ordered that Mr. John Murcot, minister of the Gospel, be desired forthwith to repair to Corke, there to exercise his gifts in the worke of the ministry, and at such other places near adjoining where he shall find his labour to be of use for propagating the Gospel; and that during his abode in those parts all due encouragement and countenance may be afforded to him."—MS. <sup>49</sup> Murcot's Life, ut supra, pp. 18—21. Dr. Edward Worth had been dean of Cork before the rebellion, but he now acted with the sectaries and renounced the worship and government of the Established Church. Like the other Episcopalian ministers in the north, as well as in the south, he re-conformed at the Restoration; he ultimately died bishop of Killaloe. It is curious to observe that not a word is said in Harris's Ware of his tergiversation in professing himself an Independent during the Protectorate. After the disputation mentioned in the text, he published a small work, printed at Cork in 1653, entitled, "Scripture Evidences for baptizing of infants of Covenanters."—Ware's Writers, p. 159. See Appendix.

<sup>50</sup> Ivimey's History of the English Baptists, i., pp. 240, 1. From the list of ministers endowed by the commonwealth in 1654, it appears that Mr. John Read, the Baptist preacher here referred to, resided stately at Belturbet, and received a salary of £120 per annum.

When Fleetwood came to Ireland in August, 1652, he was accompanied by Mr. Christopher Blackwood, another Baptist preacher, and one of his first acts was to displace Dr. Winter from the office of state-preacher to make way for Patient, who was now chaplain to Jones, one of the commissioners.<sup>51</sup> At the same time Mr. Patient was placed as minister in Christ Church, in room of Mr. Rogers, who, annoyed by the favour shown to these sectaries, had removed to London.<sup>52</sup> Blackwood resided for a short time at Kilkenny, but was afterwards "fixed with the congregation at Dublin, and Mr. Patient appointed as an evangelist to preach up and down the country."<sup>53</sup> Another of Fleetwood's favourites, Mr. Claudius Gilbert, was settled as pastor of the church at Limerick. Influenced by these violent preachers, who denounced in the strongest terms the tenets of the Presbyterians, the new deputy and commissioners resolved to make another attempt to silence the ministers in Ulster, still opposed to the authority of the commonwealth; or to remove them, if obstinate, out of the country, to make way for the predominance of their favourite sect. They appointed certain persons, styled commissioners of the revenue, to visit this province, and carry their intentions into effect. With this view, a correspondence was opened in the month of October with the members of the Presbytery, whose number had been augmented, as already stated, by the return of several brethren from Scotland.

<sup>52</sup> At Mr. Rogers' departure he received from the Council of State the following certificate, preserved in the Council Books:—"Dublin Castle, 22nd March, 1651-[2.] Whereas Mr. John Rogers, minister of the Gospel, was sent over and recommended to us by divers worthy members of the Council of State for preaching the Word of God in Ireland, where he hath continued for the space of — months, and, being now desirous to return for England, we thought fit to certify whom it may concern that the said Mr. Rogers during his residence here hath been painfull and industrious in the work of the ministry; and we shall be glad that such laborious faithful instruments may receive encouragement to repair to this land for the refreshment of poor souls, and for the propagating and carrying on the interest of Jesus Christ there."—MS. <sup>53</sup> Thurloe, iv., 90.

“Immediately after Mr. Stewart’s coming over to Donaghadee, which was in the latter end of summer, 1652, there were letters sent to the several brethren, and to him also, from those who governed the country at that time, called the commissioners of the parliament, that they desired a meeting and conference with them on the 21st of October at Belfast, to advise how the Gospel may be preached without disturbing the peace of the commonwealth, which they were informed some ministers still continued to do, as well as for begetting a greater unity and better understanding. This was subscribed by Colonel Venables, Arthur Rawdon, and Tobias Norris, at Belfast, October the 16th, 1652. The brethren, on receipt of these letters, immediately acquainted one another, and appointed a meeting amongst themselves at Comber the day before their appearance at Belfast ; where they easily supposed a new trouble was coming their way in order to their carriage to the present government. Therefore they seriously advised and debated what length they ought to go in pleasing their governors, in order for liberty for preaching the Gospel ; and drew up a paper somewhat to that purpose, declaring that, though they could not own the government as lawful, nor bind themselves by any oath or subscription to it, yet their only calling and aim was to preach the Gospel to their congregations ; and that, for their part, they were upon no intention of insurrection or disturbing the peace, and they were confident the rulers had no ground to apprehend any such thing of them.

“After they had agreed among themselves what to stick to, they came next day to Belfast ; and were immediately sent for (Mr. Taylor, &c., being messengers) by the commissioners, before whom they appeared [Thursday,] October the 21st. After the commissioners had discoursed a little to them according to the contents of their letter, the brethren, being demanded what they would do, gave in the paper they had drawn up. This being immediately before dinner, they again appeared before the commissioners after dinner ; and having appointed one of their number to speak the mind of the rest of the commissioners, they fell upon the debate of that paper they had given in—viz., whether they would take the ENGAGEMENT, or at least the negative part of it, which was to act nothing against the commonwealth of England, as now established, without king or house of lords. Upon this they debated for five or six hours without intermission. The commissioners received no satisfaction from what the ministers could condescend unto ; and next morning appearing again they could do no further. At this the commissioners were much offended, and some of them spoke bitterly to the brethren, and particularly to the brother [Mr. Adair] who had been mouth for the rest. Yet at that time they thought it not fit to use severity ; and therefore they dismissed them to their places with a command to appear again within six weeks, and in the meantime to make no insurrection in the country. The brethren waived this, but promised the former. They also delivered to them a draught differing in words from the engagement, which they desired the brethren to advise upon ; but it was found ensnaring.

“ They were thus let go. On Monday [October 25th] they appointed a private meeting in a barn, and there Mr. Andrew Stewart is appointed by the brethren to return to Scotland, and inform their brethren, with the reverend and experienced ministers there, how it stood with them in Ireland ; and requiring their advice how to carry themselves. They also sent over a copy of the paper they had given in to the commissioners, with a relation of their carriage : in all which they were approved by the worthy and reverend brethren that Mr. Stewart spoke with, such as Messrs. Blair, Dickson, Wood, &c. They [in Scotland] did not choose to give a draught, but rather thought the ministers might profess to them that they did not purpose to raise people in arms, but to live as a godly people ; and to inform and prepare the people for sufferings in the maintenance of the Gospel, if God called them to it.

“ At this time also Mr. James Ker, who had formerly fallen off from the Presbytery, and had continued in great charity toward the sectarian party for a considerable time, now desired to be readmitted to his former society with his brethren, and gave great testimonies of his ingenuously loathing his former course. The brethren at this time gave him a favourable hearing ; yet delayed his full reception until they acquainted their brethren, being the greatest number of the Presbytery, now in Scotland. For that purpose they gave commission to Mr. Stewart to acquaint them, and have their mind on it. Upon this, the brethren in Scotland did readily assent, and so Mr. Ker was received into the fellowship of his brethren upon his declared repentance : as thereafter also were Mr. O’Quin and Mr. Vesey.

“ While Mr. Stewart was in Scotland, the winds continuing contrary so that he could not return before the prescribed six weeks were completed, the brethren were again necessitated to appear before the commissioners, but still remained the same. So at length, the commissioners being weary of them, and they still more weary, the commissioners proposed to the brethren, that they should send one or two of their number to Dublin, to see if they could satisfy the Lord-General Fleetwood and the council of officers there, wherewith they should be satisfied. The brethren, though they expected not much good from this essay, yet saw not how they could shun it, being thus proposed to them. They therefore chose Mr. Archibald Ferguson and Mr. Patrick Adair for this purpose. They gave them injunctions to make their application to Fleetwood, yet restricted them from giving them any titles which seemed to approve their present power. They were also instructed to declare that they had no mind of insurrection, but only desired to preach the Gospel to a poor afflicted people, themselves being also in poverty, having their maintenance sequestered ; and that they only desired liberty to preach without impositions.

“ These two brethren having a pass from Venables, with a letter in their favour, as to their persons, to Fleetwood, they went [in January, 1653], and met with much civility from him, and from divers of the officers, especially Colonel Sankey and Colonel Hewson, being men of good tempers and lovers of good men. They also met with much bitterness from others. However, they obtained nothing to their purpose. Fleetwood, though in great power, took little upon him. The Anabaptist faction carried most sway ; and he, after divers applications to him, referred the brethren to a meeting of officers, who met in the castle of Dublin, of all sorts and sizes of them. The brethren, appearing before them, were questioned why they and their brethren would not take the engagement, nor give security to live quietly, &c. Mr. Ferguson answered, as he was enjoined, that they intended not insurrections, &c. It was aggredded with many absurdities that the ministers should expect protection within the commonwealth, and not promise fidelity. Mr. Ferguson replied, it might be dangerous to permit men in the commonwealth in such a case who, upon worldly and political considerations, refused ; but that they were to be looked upon as refusing upon no such grounds, but merely in conscience ; and that withal they were men insignificant for insurrections, and not dangerous. One Allen, an Anabaptist, replied, ‘ a Papist would and might say as much for themselves, and pretend conscience as well as they.’ Mr. Adair answered, ‘ Sir, under favour, it’s a mistake to compare our consciences with Papists ; for Papists’ consciences could digest to kill Protestant kings, but so would not ours, to which our principles are contrary.’ This harsh expression, reflecting on many there who had a hand in the King’s murder, procured a great silence ; some drawing their hats down on their faces who were in heart haters of that wickedness, and others were angry. So there was no more discourse at that time, neither were the brethren called again. But within a day or two they went to Fleetwood, who fairly dismissed them; and so they returned home with no more security than they went.

“Though the commissioners of the revenue did not own them, yet they with their brethren continued as formerly for the matter of six weeks more; at which time there were commissioners sent from Dublin to offer the engagement to the whole country. These were Dr. Henry Jones, afterwards bishop of Meath, Colonel Arthur Hill, Colonel Venables, and Major Morgan, afterwards Sir Anthony Morgan. They remained at Carrickfergus.<sup>54</sup> They first sent parties of soldiers to each minister’s house, there being but seven in the country then as already mentioned, all at the one time, who were to search all papers and letters in their houses, and bring them along from the ministers. They being suspicious that these few ministers, who so boldly owned the King’s interest upon divers occasions before themselves, must have some secret correspondence with the King’s party in Scotland, though now subdued, and under that party of the commonwealth. The soldiers narrowly searched all, but found papers with none but Mr. Adair. They took from him every paper though to never so little purpose, for they could not distinguish papers; there being none among sixteen soldiers and a sergeant, who took the papers, that could read. Among the papers they took, there was one bundle which contained the Presbytery’s Representation against the sectaries and that party; and another declaring the horridness of their murdering the King, with other papers much reflecting on their party. This bundle they took away with them in a cloak-bag among others, though Mr. Adair had used all means to preserve it, knowing they might take much occasion against the brethren upon the sight of these papers. However, they took it along in one of the cloak-bags which were full of papers. That night the sergeant kept one of the cloak-bags in the chamber where he lay, about two miles from Mr. Adair's house, and in this was that bundle. The maid of the house, hearing a report that these were Mr. Adair's papers, resolved to restore some of them to him again. And so she went in the night, when the the sergeant and soldiers were asleep, and quietly brought a bundle of papers out of the cloak-bag, not knowing what papers they were. This bundle was that which Mr. Adair only cared for; and she sent it to him next morning.

“Next week after this the commissioners gave summons to the whole country of both counties [of Down and Antrim] to appear at Carrickfergus, and assigned every barony or great parish their day of appearance; in each of which they pitched on certain persons to return all the names of masters of families in a list to the commissioners, to be called in order. Accordingly, the whole country generally appeared on their days assigned; and their names being returned, they put the names of the ministers first on the roll, purposely that each of them might have occasion to debate the engagement, being first called; and the people where each minister dwelt being present, this gave occasion to the most of them to debate the engagement with the commissioners. This was to the ministers' hazard, yet a special means to confirm the people in their duty to the King and Covenant, and guard them against it. For it fell so out that the people, who came along with the ministers, and were present at their disputing with the commissioners, wholly refused the engagement. This did much irritate the commissioners against the ministers. However they dismissed them for that week, and commanded them to return the next.

“Accordingly the ministers came, and the commissioners gave order that they should not go out of town [Carrickfergus] without their liberty; this being about the middle of May, 1653. The guards at the posts were charged to watch to that purpose. The ministers were dealt with to give some security for their peaceable carriage in the country; and never to own any other power or oppose this. They would, however, make no promises to this purpose. They were kept till Saturday [May 14th], in the evening, attending the commissioners’ pleasure; and they were informed, by some who were their friends, and yet who kept intercourse with the commissioners, that there was a frigate ready to receive them to be transported to England. It is certain that there was a frigate then attending for some service known to none but themselves. Notwithstanding this, they stood constant; and being called unto the commissioners they thought to receive a sad sentence, considering what had been their bitter expressions to them before, and considering what they had heard of the commissioners’ design and resolution that day. But, unexpectedly, they were entertained with much seeming favour and respect. The commissioners did a little resent their so plain disputing against their power. They especially declared their dissatisfaction with Mr. Ker, who had been, as they thought, their own so long; and now having been called to take the engagement with the people of that parish [Ballymoney] did not enter fairly to debate the business, but fell downright upon them, declaring how he had been deceived with the pretences of that party at first, for which he justly had been suspended by his brethren; and now whereas he thought they would favour the people of God, he saw the greatest malignants in the country were most in their favour, because they could turn any way for their own ends. This they did resent in Mr. James Ker more than in the carriage of any of the rest. However they did much insinuate on the ministers, and desired they would yet resolve to live peaceably, and preach the Gospel to the people, without reflecting on their powers; and so desired them to go to their charges.

"The brethren, being surprised with this kind entertainment, did very joyfully accept of it; and the more cheerfully that no engagement was sought from them, as always before. And now, wondering at God's merciful providence unto them after so long tossing, they hasted home that night, though very late, and kept the next day, the Sabbath, with their congregations in more than ordinary zeal; blessing God for that unexpected deliverance from their straits and troubles. Yet they knew not what was the particular occasion which moved these commissioners to such a change in their carriage to them. But of this, very shortly after, they had notice. It came not from any good-will in them to the ministers; but there was a Sovereign Ruler ordering all things even in that confused and reeling time."<sup>55</sup>

This change of conduct towards the Presbytery resulted from important alterations in the constitution of the commonwealth, which had, in the meantime, unexpectedly occurred at the seat of government in London.

THE ambition of Cromwell could ill brook the controlling authority of the parliament. By the decisive battle of Worcester in 1651, which compelled Charles the Second to abandon the kingdom and seek safety on the Continent, his popularity and influence became almost unbounded. Supported by a devoted and hitherto invincible army, residing with his family in one of the royal palaces, and enjoying even more than royal patronage, courted by the ambassadors of foreign powers, and his protection humbly craved by the royalist nobility, it is not surprising he should aspire to the actual possession of uncontrolled power, and disclaim the superiority of the few speculative politicians who now constituted the parliament of England. His first object was to effect, if possible, the peaceable dissolution of this formidable assembly, which had sat without intermission from November, 1640. Through the agency of his officers, many of whom were members, and all of whom he studiously inflamed against the other members as indolent, thankless, and corrupt statesmen, he endeavoured to obtain a vote of the parliament for its own immediate dissolution. Disappointed, however, in this attempt, he proceeded to the house on Wednesday, the 20th of April, and, after mingling for some time with apparent composure in the debate respecting the act for dissolving the parliament, which it was apparent would not be carried agreeably to his wishes, he at length gave the appointed signal, and a party of military entering the house, the members by his orders were forcibly expelled, the mace removed, and the doors locked. In the afternoon, with similar violence he dispersed the council of state; and having thus wholly abolished both the legislative and executive institutions of the infant republic, he vested the supreme power of the commonwealth in nine officers and four civilians, associated with himself in a new council of state.

The news of this unexpected revolution reached Carrickgus on the day on which the members of the Presbytery appeared before the commissioners. The intelligence entirely disconcerted their plans, the power from which they derived their authority being at an end. No other alternative remained than to exhort the ministers to a peaceable conduct and dismiss them to their parishes without delay. The commissioners in Dublin, however, having cheerfully submitted to the new council of state, and the commissions of the subordinate courts having been renewed throughout the kingdom, the original design of removing "all the popular Scotts" out of Ulster was immediately resumed. A proclamation was published by "the commissioners for the settling and securing the province of Ulster," specifying the conditions on which it was proposed to transplant the leading Presbyterians in the counties of Down and Antrim to certain districts in Munster. This proclamation was accompanied with a list of two hundred and sixty persons—including all those who by their known attachment to monarchical and Presbyterian principles, and by their station and influence, were most obnoxious to the reigning faction—who were required, within a specified time and under certain penalties, to embrace the terms now offered. The proposals of the commissioners for effecting this extensive revolution in the population and property of a great part of Ulster having been hitherto unrecorded, no apology will be necessary for embodying them in a history of the province to which they refer.<sup>1</sup>

"Whereas the right honourable the commissioners of the commonwealth of England have commissioned us, for the settling and securing of these parts from those disturbances which the council of state did intimate unto them were like to arise here, through the designs of the neighbouring Highlanders in Scotland, and whereas many persons here have (to our grief) too much confirmed those fears; in discharge of that trust reposed in us, that the good people here of the English and Scottish nation, who have manifested their good affection towards the present government, might receive all due protection and encouragement, we have thought fit as the most probable expedient for the peace and settlement of this province, to transplant a certain number of such persons as we judge

<sup>1</sup> A copy of this proclamation, signed by Robert Venables, Arthur Hill, William Allen, Henry Jones, and Anthony Morgan, and printed on a broadside by "William Bladen, Dublin, Anno Domini, 1653," I was fortunate enough to meet with in the British Museum. In the Appendix, I have inserted the list of persons annexed to it, forming a very curious and valuable document, from its exhibiting the names of the more noted and influential Presbyterians then residing in the respective districts of Down and Antrim.

(by reason of their interest and disaffection) to be therein most dangerous, into the provinces of Leinster and Munster. And that we might show our tenderness towards them (notwithstanding their present temper), and that we have no other end in this action, next to preservation of the peace in these parts, than their good and welfare ; We do hereby declare, that the ensuing conditions or articles shall, God willing, be made good to the respective persons who shall be so transplanted:—

“First,—Valuable consideration in land, computed as the same was worth in the year 1640, shall be allowed for the land, leases, and houses of such as shall be so transplanted, valued as aforesaid, according to their respective interests, and the qualifications under which they do fall in the printed act for settlement of August, 1652, entitled ‘An act for the settling of Ireland.’ And to that end, persons of judgment and known integrity shall be, with all convenient speed, appointed surveyors upon oath of the value of the said land, leases, and houses of such as shall be removed as aforesaid, according unto such answerable satisfaction as shall be given as aforesaid. And whilst the said surveys are making, the said persons now removing shall be possessed of such land by an estimate according to the rule and proportion aforesaid. And the places whereunto they shall be transplanted, shall be the parts of the counties Kilkennie, Typerarie, and Waterford, the barony of the Decies in the county of Waterford bordering upon the sea, and such other parts of that countie near the city of Waterford, where they may with security inhabit, in such places as the commissioners of the revenue or other persons authorised within those precincts shall appoint.

“Secondly,—The said persons shall hold such lands, if the lands unto which they be transplanted be now waste, and shall pay no contribution thereout, till November come twelvemonth: after which time they are to pay proportionable taxes with the rest of their neighbours.

“Thirdly,—The said persons shall be allowed what wood is necessary either for the building of new or repairing of old houses on the said lands ; and the same shall be appointed out of the commonwealth’s woods.

“Fourthly,—The said persons shall and may enjoy by their agents the profits of their lands they now possess till November next ensuing the date hereof. And notwithstanding that it is the custom of the country that all removers pay a year’s contribution after removal in the places from whence they remove ; yet for the further encouragement of the persons so removing, it is condescended that they shall pay the contribution charged on the lands they now possess in Ulster only during the time of their holding the said lands by their said agents, and not after the 1st of November next.

“Fifthly,—The State shall, if the said persons desire it, take off all their corn now upon the ground, being made into meal, and delivered into the public stores at a market price, and shall pay the money so due to them for it, at what place they shall desire in Ireland.

“Sixthly,—Convoys shall be allowed for the persons and goods of such as shall be so removed.

“Seventhly,—The said persons shall and may enjoy the freedom of their religion, and choose their own ministers ; provided they shall be such as shall be peaceable-minded men towards the authority they live under, and not scandalous : and such ministers shall be allowed a competence for their subsistence, suitable with others in their condition.

“Eightly,—Such of the said persons who have no title to land shall have leases, of so much as they can stock, at a valuable rent and contribution free, if it be waste when they enter upon it, till November next come twelvemonth.

“And we do further declare, that all those who have signified their willingness to remove on the conditions tendered, as also any of the rest that yet shall, by the —— day of June next, signify their willingness to the commissioners of the revenue of the precinct of Belfast, and give in sufficient security to remove as aforesaid, shall have these conditions fully made good to them in as ample manner as they are here tendered: And for any other of these numbers who shall not, by the day aforesaid, so declare their intentions, and give security for performance as aforesaid, we shall, in order to the public safety, enforce them to remove into such places, with abatement in the conditions, where they may not be capable of doing that mischief which they give us much cause to believe they only want power and opportunity to practise in the places where they now are. And because such persons may not pretend ignorance of what is herein declared, we have inserted their names at the bottom of this declaration, with the names of such other persons as we find necessary to be removed for the ends aforesaid: Further requiring the commissioners of applotment in each respective quarter to make known to all and every of the said persons undernamed what is herein declared, who are to render an account to the said commissioners of the revenue of their proceedings herein, with the names of such as are, or shall not, be willing to accept of the said proposals; to the end that such farther proceedings may be made therein, as shall be suitable to the purposes aforesaid. Which we do hereby authorise and require all officers and persons concerned herein to execute: Dated at Carrickfergus, the 23d of May, 1653."

Immediately after the publication of this proclamation, Sir Robert Adair, of Ballymena, Mr. Shaw, of Ballygelly, and other leading Presbyterians, were sent to Munster to examine the allotted lands, and other preliminary steps were taken during the summer towards effecting the proposed transplantation. "But matters in England being in a continual unsettledness through Cromwell's driving on his design for his own advancement to the supreme government, and the opposition of many in the army wholly against the government's being settled in one single person; this motion of the governors here in Ireland had no bottom to rest upon, therefore their project of transplanting the Scotch to Tipperary, &c., did vanish within a little time; and the ministers and people in this country began to have a great calm for all the former storms they had endured. For Oliver coming to the supreme ordering of affairs, used other methods and took other measures than the rabble Rump Parliament. He did not force any engagement or promise upon people contrary to their conscience; knowing that forced obligations of that kind will bind no man. For men who are not ruled by conscience can easily break these, and shake off these obligations whenever opportunity offers; and men of conscience if they should be constrained and tempted to them, they will find themselves under a necessity to repent. Thus ministers in the country began to enjoy great liberty for their ministry; and their brethren in Scotland began to return in peace to their parishes without molestation."<sup>2</sup>

The violent dissolution of the Long Parliament was but one step in Cromwell's advance to supreme power. Not long after that event, he summoned certain persons to meet at Whitehall in the beginning of July, to whom he gave the name of a parliament; and who, he hoped, would serve as a cloak for his own ambitious projects. But the majority of the members proved to be violent and fanatical Anabaptists, and he soon found them indisposed to defer to his advice. But by a dexterous manœuvre of his friends, this assembly, styled in history, from the droll name of one of its members,<sup>3</sup> Barebone's parliament, was peaceably dissolved. They resigned their power into the hands of Cromwell; who, immediately after, proclaimed himself Lord Protector of the Commonwealth, and on the 16th of December was solemnly installed in this new office, with even more than regal state.

At this restoration of the monarchy in the person of Cromwell, Fleetwood and the other Baptists composing the Irish council were highly incensed. With great difficulty they were induced to proclaim him as Lord Protector, though, at the same time, they took little pains to conceal their disappointment or repress their indignation. In the beginning of March, 1654, Oliver took the precaution of sending over his son Henry, a prudent and excellent young man, of whom frequent mention will be subsequently made, to ascertain the state of parties in Ireland, and especially the feelings of the army then under the command of Ludlow, a resolute and consistent republican. He was received in Dublin on Saturday, the 4th of March, with every mark of respect, by the council of state, the judges, the civic authorities, and the citizens who were not Baptists.<sup>4</sup> He found the council unpopular and inactive; "doing very little," as he writes in one of his letters, "unless it be to make orders to give away the public lands, of which they have given large proportions to each of themselves." With respect to the army, he states, they are "abundantly satisfied and well pleased with the present government in England, unless it be some few inconsiderable persons of the Anabaptist judgment, whoe are allsoe quiett, though not verry well contented." And with regard to the country generally, he adds—"sober men (not Anabaptists) are overjoyed with hopes that the time is now come of their deliverance from that bondage and subjection which they were in to the [council] of which I have hade large and indeed sade complaynts from all handes, and am confirmed in it upon my own observation; the uttmost that is desired is, that all may be uppon ane equall account as to encouragement and countenance ;”<sup>5</sup>—an obvious principle of good government, though, even yet, not carried into full operation in Ireland. During his residence in Dublin, Henry visited the college, “where he was entertained with copies of verses, speeches, and disputation;” and after a fortnight’s stay, he returned to England. This visit tended much to abate the violent sectarianism of the Baptist faction, and to induce the council to act with greater moderation and impartiality. It reconciled many parties to the domination of Cromwell; and congratulatory addresses from the officers of the army in Ireland,<sup>6</sup> and from several Independent congregations—including one from Patient’s church in Dublin, signed by one hundred and twenty names—were soon after forwarded to him, under the style and title of “His highness the Lord Protector of the Common-wealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland.”<sup>7</sup>

The beneficial effects of this visit extended also to Ulster. All attempts to extort an oath of fidelity, or to punish those <sup>6</sup> Nickoll’s “State Papers,” pp. 144, 145. This address is signed by 110 officers, and is without date; but it was evidently drawn up on this occasion, when there was a general council of officers assembled in Dublin during Henry Cromwell’s stay. See Thurloe, ii., 150., and 213.

<sup>7</sup> The address from the Church at Limerick under Gilbert, signed by himself and eighteen others, and dated, “12th month, 25th day, 1653,” i.e., the 25th of March, 1654, may be found in Thurloe, ii., 117, 118. That from the “Church of the baptised Christians in Dublin” under Patient, the most prominent of the Baptist teachers, may be found in Nickolls, pp. 148, 149. The observable change in the temper and proceedings of the council, consequent upon H. Cromwell’s visit, had its effect in thinning the Baptist congregations, and moderating the violence of their teachers. It is stated in a letter from Dublin of the 5th of April, only a few weeks after his departure, that the opposition of the Anabaptists was at an end, and that “a stranger would never believe there had been any difference; unless upon the Sabbath a congregation may be discerned, of which Mr. Patience is pastor, from whose church those in profitable employment daily do decline.”—Thurloe, ii., 213. Perhaps it may not be unacceptable to subjoin, from the same letter, an account of the hardships and difficulties incurred in planting the lands in the southern province. “As to the nature of a plantation it thus remains as neere as I can discern; every planter runnes two hazards, of his owne losses and of other men’s, his neighbours; and I think I shall now unfold an enigma to you; for certainly noe man’s industry can so secure him but that the ill husbandry of his neighbour may undoe him; for admit a proportion be taxed uppon a whole hundred, if any prove unable to pay, theyr goods are seized and their persons imprisoned, and the entire tax continued uppon the rest, and see to the last man without who had refused the engagement were abandoned. The Presbyterian ministers in the country were permitted to officiate without any restraint, and those who had either fled to Scotland, or been transported thither by Venables, successively returned. Adair thus notices the gradual amelioration, which now so providentially occurred, in the circumstances and prospects of the Church:—"The first beginning and day-break of liberty to this poor Church of Ireland seemed to be the dispute at Antrim already mentioned. After this, the few ministers were not prohibited preaching, though vexed with their appearance for a while before the commissioners of revenue. Thereafter, the Lady Clotworthy, a noble and religious matron, did intercede with Colonel Venables, for liberty to her minister, Mr. Ferguson, to return to his church; which being granted, Mr. Andrew Stewart at Donaghadee did also hazard a visit to his congregation, though without licence, and upon that account was not checked by the commissioners. He returned [to Scotland] after a while, and staid till the rest of the brethren came over; having a commission from his brethren in Ireland to consult with the gravest ministers in Scotland anent their present case, and have their judgments upon divers questions as to their carriage under present circumstances—especially as to their carriage towards usurping powers. Unto all this, after a time, they had satisfying answers, very little differing from the way they had been led in before.

"After this, the rest of the brethren returned from Scotland with passes from the English government there; and when they returned, they presented themselves to Venables. Some of them also going up to Dublin, procured a present maintenance to themselves without any conditions asked or given, but that they had the free exercise of their ministry. For Cromwell then being at the helm, and his son-in-law, Fleetwood, being deputy of Ireland, he did labour to ingratiate all sorts of persons and parties. Besides, Fleetwood, though inclining to Anabaptist courses, was no enemy to the Presbyterian party, and a man of much charity to all who had profession of godliness. Upon this favourable reception by those in power for the time, the brethren thought it their duty to fall about the duty of meeting together presbyterially, as they had formerly done: which they did publickly and frequently without any restraint from the powers, sometimes in one place and sometimes in another; and for a while only in the houses of one another, where all the rest met, and brought their elders, who were fit and willing, always along with them. They met at Templepatrick, Cairncastle, Comber, Bangor, &c., for a while, till at last they settled their meetings as before. This was in the year 1654, when this poor Church had a new sunshine of liberty of all ordinances, and much of the blessing and countenance of God concurring therewith in those congregations where ministers had been planted.

any distinction of persons or nation. I talkt with a gentleman within these few hours, lately a captain in the army, who married and entered upon a farm rented of the State (such lands not being exempted from tax unless excepted in the lease; his stock being a hundred head of great cattle was in a year and halfe, meerly by tax, reduced to six cowes; which also at last were taken and he imprisoned, and hardly gott leave, by pawning his debentures, to come up to Dublin to sue for relief. This is a case so much resembling a romance, that it is not to be related but between friend and friend."—Ibid.

“Yet as it is usual in like cases that God’s goodness to His people generally enrages His enemies on all hands, there was in the country not only a standing power of the sectarian party, Anabaptist, &c., but the old Episcopal party who now, when the power was out of their own hands to afflict the Presbytery, did insinuate on those who had power, as they did now with the sectaries, to incense them against that liberty the ministers had, as also against their discipline and public solemnities at communions, &c., and besides, suggesting that these their meetings were dangerous to the State, and that they had therein their consultations for strengthening their own faction. This so wrought with an Anabaptist governor, Colonel Barrow, then in the county of Down, that he became highly incensed and jealous of these meetings, and resolved to use his endeavours to obtain an order for suppressing them. It fell out that, at a communion in Portaferry, there was an English gentleman from King's county, an Independent in his opinions, waiting there for a passage to England; and though it was not his principle to join with Presbyterians in their public worship, yet, being there, he wished to see the fashion. Being present at the whole work, he was so taken with it, and saw so much of the power and presence of God with His servants and people, that he, on his return to Colonel Barrow, his acquaintance, professed he never saw more of God in an assembly of people—yea, he questioned if God was so much among any people as among these Presbyterians in this country. Colonel Barrow, being a man pretending to much piety, and, though of Anabaptist principles yet not of a malicious disposition, from this time had more respect to the ministers, and used not his interest to suppress their liberty in the country. Besides, he thereby got a better character of the malignant informers. Thus this poor Church, being in a great measure restored to former freedom, and enjoying their ministers who had been banished, the Lord so countenanced their labours that many other congregations, in places of the country that had not been planted before, began to seek for ministers to be settled among them. In general, these motions from new places were well accepted by the Presbytery, who resolved to concur with the people. But, in the entrance, there fell in some difficulties upon occasion of their different opinions in Scotland, most young men there siding with the one party or the other.

The two parties into which the Church of Scotland was now divided were bitterly opposed to each other, and by their dissensions almost every synod and presbytery was distracted. This lamentable schism originated in certain resolutions adopted by the commission of the Church in December, 1650, and in March, 1651, and subsequently approved by two General Assemblies, by which the Church unhappily sanctioned the admission of royalists, and other enemies to the religious rights of the kingdom, into places of civil and military trust, in order, as it was plausibly urged, to unite all classes in support of the claims of their covenanted sovereign, Charles the Second. This sacrifice of principle to a temporary expediency, by entrusting the defence of their dearly-bought liberties to the bigoted upholders of despotic measures, both in Church and State, was highly offensive to a large portion of the more zealous ministers and elders, who protested against the constitution and proceedings of the superior courts that had sanctioned the obnoxious resolutions. These two parties, distinguished by the names of resolutioners and protestors, carried their disputes to a deplorable extreme. They refused to hold communion with one another, and each denounced the highest censures against their opponents. This distracting controversy was at its height when the Irish ministers were obliged to fly to Scotland; and, had it not been for their singular prudence and forbearance, under divine guidance, the same unhappy schism would undoubtedly have been introduced into Ulster, "alienating the hearts of the godly one from the other, and marring the work of God in, it." Adair thus narrates the judicious proceedings of the brethren at this critical conjuncture:—

"The Irish ministers, being settlers in divers presbyteries [in Scotland] of divers judgments as to this controversy, did incline to those opinions of which their respective presbyteries were; and thus they became divided among themselves, inso-much that those of the protesting opinions joined with the Presbytery where they were, in emitting protestations and testimonies against the public acts of the commission of the Church in Scotland, and other judicatories of that Church. Upon this, the commission of the Church, in their public papers, reflected on the whole exiled ministers of Ireland as meddling with things which did not belong unto them. These public reflections on the ministers from Ireland by the standing judicatories of the Church of Scotland, did put these brethren upon unanimous thoughts of meeting amongst themselves from the divers places where they were; that upon mutual conferring they might, if possible, agree among themselves, and walk orderly and harmoniously as became strangers in a divided Church. They first met at Ayr, where their former acquaintance and heart-warming they had in Ireland did revive. After long and serious communication among themselves, they found the hazard of their present divisions among themselves, not only as rendering them more obnoxious to exceptions and reflections where they at present were, but being also hazardous that if, through God's mercy, they should return to their charges in Ireland, they might carry as much of a strange fire in their skirts as might kindle division in that little Church, and make irreparable rents among themselves. Whereupon they entered upon a conclusion which had afterwards good influence on their appearance after their return to Ireland, that, whatever were their different apprehensions as to these differences in Scotland, yet all of them should forbear practically engaging in these divisions, but keep themselves free from divisive facts, paper-subscriptions of either party, and from synods or presbyteries which divided among themselves and had gone to different parties; which was the immediate consequence of these sad differences at this time. After this conclusion thus unanimously adopted among themselves, they kept correspondence thereafter; and for keeping it up, they resolved to meet once a month at Maybole that they might have a good understanding of one another; and confer not only of their own carriage in their exiled condition, but in order to the case of Ireland and their own return, as God should offer opportunity. These meetings of the brethren at

Maybole did continue till their return to Ireland, not without mutual refreshment and good fruit."<sup>8</sup>

When the favourable measures of Cromwell's government opened a door for the return of the exiled ministers, the utmost prudence and vigilance were necessary to guard the Church in Ulster from the introduction of the same ruinous schism. "For some brethren," as Adair relates, "who had lately come over, being of the protestors' opinion, had invited one or two young men of the same opinion to come over, and had employed them in preaching without acquainting their brethren of the Presbytery. The most of the brethren here, not being of these opinions and hearing of this, did resent the practice as disorderly and dangerous; especially there being the whole country of the Lagan to be planted, except the two brethren, Mr. Hugh Cunningham and Mr. William Semple, who had been in Scotland and favoured the protestors, and other two who had lurked in the country, and were easily drawn to their opinion. The Presbytery apprehended they might plant that country and the Rout with persons so fixed in the protesting way as to found a division between ministers of that part of the country and the rest of the brethren; and to provoke ministers who were of the other opinion to deal as vigorously for men of their own opinions. Upon these considerations the body of the Presbytery declared to those brethren their disorderliness, and told them that such practices could not be borne with.

"However, another meeting was appointed at Bangor, where all the brethren met; and before their sitting down, some jealousies and animosities began to appear between these two parties of brethren who came from Scotland; notwithstanding that before their coming over they had come to a good understanding one with another, and resolved to continue so. The few who had been left in the country were unconcerned in the difference ; therefore the brethren coming together to the place of meeting, which was the church of Bangor, one of these brethren, whom neither party did mistrust, was by common consent chosen moderator. Immediately he, having been made acquainted with the present case by some of the brethren of both parties, proposed a committee to be chosen of more experienced brethren to bring in overtures to the Presbytery, in order to establish unity among themselves, and for planting new congregations. This being assented to, the moderator, according to custom, made a list equally of both parties, viz., Mr. Drysdale, Mr. Cunningham, and Mr. Semple, who were all of the protesting opinions ; and Mr. Greg, Mr. Stewart, and another of the other side, who were also approved by the rest. They, together with the moderator, were to meet for preparing these overtures. This accordingly they did ; the rest of the brethren going through other business in the Presbytery in the meantime. The brethren did calmly consult of their present case and hazard of division among themselves, and what mischievous consequences it might bring to this Church ; as well as of the dangerous consequences of bringing over young men from Scotland, and settling them ministers, who were fixed on contrary parties and factions, which might lay the foundation of a constant rupture in this Church, which the Lord in mercy had hitherto kept entire and in great unity and uniformity in affection, principles, and practices. They therefore agreed upon some overtures to be presented to the rest of the brethren, and which were readily assented to, and presbyterially concluded by them [on Wednesday, the 2nd of August].

“The first overture, called the ACT OF BANGOR, was that as to the brethren present, though some differed in opinion from the rest, yet there should be no mutual contestings about the differences in Scotland among themselves, nor any owning of them on either side in public preaching or prayer, nor in conference among the people, as siding with one party more than another. But whatever mention might indirectly be made of these divisions, it should be in order to healing them in Scotland, and praying for that end, and for preventing them among us, among whom there was not even an imaginary ground for such divisions.

“The second related to the planting the Church with men from Scotland. On this subject the Presbytery resolved ; first, to endeavour for men of abilities for gifts of learning and prudence, knowing that there are many enemies and observers of ministers of our persuasion in this country, so that men need abilities to answer enemies on all hands, and a walk so as to convince gainsayers, and bring a good report from them who live without. Secondly, that they should be pious; knowing that other qualifications without this are not usually blessed in the ministry, and that men, living in this country among so many troubles, and where there is no discipline, had need to be fixed on godliness, and have some savouriness in their carriage in order to a bond on people’s consciences, though they have no external power. Thirdly, that they should be peaceable, that is, not violent in either of those ways now debated in Scotland; but, whatever were their private thoughts, they should be of that temper as to be submissive to their brethren, and not trouble this Church with their opinions.

“The third related to the sending and applying for such learned and godly men to Scotland. In order to this, the Presbytery ordered : First, that no congregation should send to Scotland for a minister without acquainting them. Secondly, that the Presbytery should appoint some brethren to write to the gravest ministers of both judgments that they would give the persons commissioned from their respective parishes their advice, in order to obtaining pious and peaceable young men. Thirdly, that none should be received here but such as had the recommendation of worthy ministers of both sides. Fourthly, and that thereafter none should be admitted but such as, after trial and approbation and otherwise, should engage and subscribe to this peaceable deportment called the Act of Bangor.

“The Presbytery also determined that not only the young men from Scotland should have sufficient testimonials from learned and godly men there; but they resolved to take special trial of them themselves before they allowed any parish to give them a call, first by private conference with some brethren appointed for that purpose, to know what they had read and what stock of learning they had, not only in those points taught in the philosophy colleges in Scotland, but also how they had improved their time after that, whether in colleges of divinity, or, if they had not that opportunity, how they improved their time otherwise as to grounding themselves in positive divinity, and studying common-places in controversial divinity and Church history, and what acquaintance they had with the Bible. They were furthermore appointed to preach, not only in that congregation which might have an eye to them, but in congregations near the same bounds, in order that both ministers and the more knowing of the people might have some taste of their gifts. This narrow scrutiny seemed then necessary, considering so many congregations were now calling for ministers, and that some young men came over of their own accord, though not without some testimonials and recommendations from worthy ministers in whose bounds they had resided, yet not altogether in the order the Presbytery appointed. Besides, the more that were to be admitted, there was the greater need of narrow searching, lest new places should be planted with insufficient men, whereby people, who were but coming in to the Gospel, and not confirmed in it, might have been at first entry stumbled, and the Lord's work in these places hazarded. It is true some did come over according to the order, and yet proved not sound hereafter, as appeared when the troubles came. When young men had thus come over and passed their private sorts of trials, then the brethren being satisfied with them did concur with the parishes who called them, and put them upon ordinary public trials in order to ordination and settling them in that particular place, according to the common method and order; unto which was usually added, at the time of their ordination and before imposition of hands, that they declared their adhering to the Solemn League and Covenant, and that they were but to subscribe the Act of Bangor, which was kept on record.<sup>9</sup>

“The Lord blessed these endeavours of the Presbytery very signally. For many young men were brought from Scotland by degrees, all of them with the testimonials required, and professing their willingness to live peaceably without owning the differences in Scotland. Yea, both the brethren who had been here before and those coming over of late had a merciful harmony in everything, and no noise among the people of any differences which so divided the Church of Scotland, but to regret them. And it is observable; that the most grave, experienced, and godly ministers in Scotland of both sides, did much approve this way that the Presbytery took to prevent their own divisions; all of them testified to the brethren in Ireland who occasionally went to Scotland about these times, not one of them disapproving their prudent measures.

<sup>9</sup> The following is a copy of this ACT which I found in the Minutes of the Lagan Presbytery, and which all their candidates signed, in common with those of the other meetings. “The Presbytery ordains that as we have unanimously resolved not to foment the present differences in Scotland in this Church, but to forbear the very discourse of them which may tend to altercation, and to discountenance the same in others; so also, that intrants shall oblige themselves to the same orderly walk in this respect; and that hereupon none that shall be found to be sober, godly, and able, shall be opposed in his entry, whatever be his judgment in relation to these differences.” To it there is appended the following note:—“The manner of the obligation is found in the Presbytery-book to be by registering their consent therein.”

“The number of ministers in planted congregations growing and considerably spreading unto all parts of the north of Ireland, it was found that the Presbytery could not all meet together in one place where formerly they had done from the first beginning of church discipline in these parts. Therefore the Presbytery found it necessary that there should be three different meetings in different parts of the country, for the better and more speedy carrying on the work of God in divers counties, and taking order with scandals in these parts, and concurring in matters of discipline as particular congregations should require their help. And withal that these distinct meetings should take trials of entrance within their particular bounds, upon their finding the calls clear to congregations. These MEETINGS were not constituted into presbyteries strictly so called, as acting by power in themselves. But they acted by commission of the whole Presbytery met together; their commission being drawn and subscribed by the clerk of the Presbytery for what they did. These committee-meetings had power only to visit empty congregations; to dissuade people from hearing hirelings; to erect and give advice to sessions anent scandalous persons and their repentance; to try what duties ministers and elders performed in their charges; to see what care congregations took to maintain ministers; to inspect expectants’ testimonials coming from Scotland; and, if approved, to license them to preach till the Presbytery met, but not in relation to trial; to preach and censure doctrine at their meetings; to take account of one another’s diligence; and to divide the controversies of the times among themselves. But, on the other hand, they were not to enter expectants upon trial in reference to congregations till the Presbytery was satisfied with their testimonials; nor were these young men to be ordained till the Presbytery should have report and satisfaction concerning their abilities after trials were passed. Thus the work of the Presbytery was facilitated by these meetings commissioned by them. They were called the meetings of Down, Antrim, and Route with Lagan.

It may be here remarked, that in 1657, a further subdivision of the Presbytery took place. The meeting of Route sup-plicated the Presbytery to be disjoined from Lagan. This was, for the sake of convenience, accordingly done; and shortly after another meeting was formed in Tyrone, so that there were five meetings.<sup>10</sup>

“ Besides, the Gospel spread into divers counties and places of the north of Ireland, where the purity and power of ordinances had never been known before; such as Armagh, Fermanagh, Tyrone, Monaghan, and Cavan, beside a further

<sup>10</sup> These five meetings or presbyteries continued without any change until the year 1702, when nine presbyteries were formed, which have been subsequently augmented to twenty-four, the number at present constituting the General Synod of Ulster. I have examined a small volume containing the minutes of the meeting of Antrim, from October, 1654, probably the period when they first met as a separate body distinct from the general Presbytery, until May, 1658. The first meeting was held at Ballycarry, and is entitled, “ The visitation of the kirk of Braidycland, kept October 11th, 1654.” Great complaints were made of the difficulty of securing the maintenance of Mr. Cunningham, and of the other ministers whose parishes were visited in succession. Mr. Ferguson, of Antrim, died in December, 1654, and Mr. Somerville, minister of Ballyclare, a short time previously. The first ordination was that of the Rev. Gilbert Simpson, at Ballyclare, on the 9th of August, 1655, “ on bonds securing him £40 for the first year, £50 yearly thereafter during the sequestration [of the tithes], and £60 yearly after the removing of the sequestration; with £4 yearly in lieu of a glebe and £20 in hand for building a manse.” On the 15th of the same month, the Rev. John Douglas was ordained at Broughshane, and, on the 28th, the Rev. Thomas Crawford at Donegore, where Captain James Adair and Lieutenant Robert Ferguson had previously satisfied the Presbytery as to the amount of his maintenance, which was much the same as that secured to Mr. Simpson. In 1655, the vacant congregations were Antrim, Carnmoney, Islandmagee, Glenarm, Connor, Drumaul, Ahoghill, Clough, and Loughgeel. There were no Presbyterian ministers permitted to reside at Lisburn, Belfast, or Carrickfergus, these being the army quarters, and served by Baptist and Independent teachers. On the 21st of May, 1656, the Rev. John Couthart (or Cathcart) was ordained at Drumaul, and, in July, 1657, the Rev. James Shaw at Carnmoney; and, at the period when these minutes close, Mr. James Fleming was on trials for Glenarm, on bonds for £60 a year, with a manse and glebe, Mr. John Shaw for Ahoghill, and Mr. Robert Dewart for Connor, all of whom were ordained during the year 1658. The Rev. Robert Rowan was soon after settled at Clough, and the Rev. Andrew Rowan at Loughgeel, or Armoy. There were seventeen congregations under care of this Presbytery.

enlargement of the Gospel in Londonderry. Though there were not above twenty-four ministers planted belonging to the Presbytery in the year 1653, yet they had multiplied to near eighty within a few years thereafter; even in the sight and to the angering of their adversaries on all hands, viz., the old Episcopal party, who then complied with the prevailing party, and the Anabaptists and other sectaries, who then had special influence upon all affairs. This was the hand of God covering a table to His people in the sight of their enemies, and making His wonderful work to appear and prosper in the hands of a few despised and hated men, even under the feet of those who lately before had been their persecutors, driving the most of them out of the country and the few that were left into corners. And it ought never to be forgotten how in this poor Church from the beginning of planting the Gospel in it, that, though the sovereign wise God thought fit to let loose the enemies of the power and purity of the Gospel, so far against its servants and people as to persecute and drive them out of the country, for a testimony and sealing of the truth with their sufferings; yet the same faithful and wise God did shortly after take up the possession of the land with great advantage. Thus it was in the prelates' times; thus it was in the sectaries' times, as appears by this narrative; all which we are only to ascribe to God's goodness, and tenderness to His work, and people, and poor servants.

"Meantime the ministers had no settled maintenance. Those who after a while's suffering and want here had been banished to Scotland, were, during their abode there, provided for with the legal maintenance of the parishes there in which they supplied. Those few who were left in Ireland, beside their hazard from their persecutors and many other inconveniences, had nothing allowed them now for full five years [from 1649 to 1654] except what the people under the burdens and oppressions of strangers could out of their poverty spare them. And though for new intrants the Presbytery obtained some better conditions from the parishes that called them, than they got for themselves who had been called before; yet the conditions were but small, and in most places scarcely able to afford any comfortable subsistence. In this case Providence ordered that Sir John Clotworthy came from England into these parts to visit his mother, and to order the estate and things for the family whom he was to bring over shortly after. Mr. Adair having occasion to discourse with him in order to providing a minister for Antrim, Mr. Ferguson being now dead, Sir John inquired how the ministers in this country were maintained in this juncture of affairs. Mr. Adair in reply gave the account just related. Upon which that worthy gentleman did much regret the case of the ministers, and proposed to Mr. Adair that, if the brethren would send one or two of their number to Dublin along with him, whither he was shortly to return on his way to London, together with some from the country to represent the case of ministers to Fleetwood and the council there, he would use his endeavours to obtain maintenance for ministers who were known to be worthy. Upon Mr. Adair's acquainting his own meeting and that of Down with his motion, Down chose Mr. Stewart from the ministers, and Captain James Moor from the country, to repair to Dublin for this end; and Antrim chose Mr. Adair from the ministers, and desired Captain Langford from the country, that they might attend Sir John Clotworthy, and be advised by him. Accordingly they all went except Captain Langford.<sup>11</sup>

"In this negotiation Sir John first applied to Fleetwood without their counsel, and some other members of his acquaint-

<sup>11</sup> I find it stated in the "minutes of the meeting of the brethren of Antrim," at Ballyclare, on Wednesday, the 4th of April, 1655, that "Mr. Adair was absent at Dublin on public concerns," which corroborates the text, and fixes the date of this transaction.

ance, from whom he had fair promises of their concurrence with his desires. The motion was from the country and not from the ministers themselves; and the only desire was to take off the sequestration that now had been of ministers' maintenance for these five last years. Thereafter the motion was brought before the council. In it there were men of divers complexions, some of Anabaptist opinions, who carried much at that time, and were no good friends to Presbyterians. Others were politicians designing to bring ministers under an undue dependency on the State for their livelihood. Therefore they proposed to give the ministers a competent maintenance out of the treasury, and that quarterly.<sup>12</sup> This being considered by the ministers, who did not appear before the council, but waited for what might concern them in this affair, they declined such a way of maintenance, but desired they might have their legal maintenance belonging to their respective parishes; though almost none of these maintenances were of near equal value to what the council proposed. They gave into the council's hands the reasons of their so pleading; which some of their number, having first seen in private, did much approve of. They were not however sustained by Fleetwood and the council. Sir John, being present before the council, pleaded for the ministers' paper, and conducted it with much affection to the ministers, and magnanimous zeal to have them provided; with some express reflections on the present course of that time, where unlettered mechanics and inferior officers of the army, being Anabaptists, were largely provided for out of the public treasury for their ignorant preaching and seducing the people. But they had such a reverence for him that they overlooked what he said, and yet stuck to their own point. They returned the ministers this answer, that they would not allow them any other way of maintenance than by salary, according as some of their professsion in the Lagan and the Route had already.<sup>13</sup> For these brethren, having been of the opinion of the protestors in Scotland, had obtained this way of maintenance previous to this motion of Sir John Clot-

<sup>13</sup> It is surprising how little is known of the administration of Irish affairs during the Protectorate. The inquirer who consults the ordinary histories of the kingdom for information on the subject, in reference either to the civil, military, commercial, or ecclesiastical branches of the government, will be woefully disappointed. In relation to the last of these, the ecclesiastical, with which alone I have to do, I have endeavoured to obtain as ample and authentic information as my limited opportunities of research permitted. I was particularly anxious to ascertain the nature and extent of the State endowments to the clergy, and, if possible, the names and salaries of the several ministers, and in this inquiry I happily succeeded. I have in my possession two lists, one for the year 1654, the other for 1655, containing the names of all the ministers throughout Ireland who received salaries from the State, with the sums payable to each. The former list I owe to the kindness of Sir William Betham; to the latter I had access among the State papers in Dublin Castle, and, as it is the fuller and more complete list, I have inserted it in the Appendix, with a few additions from that for the previous year. I find in these lists the names of only six ministers known to be Presbyterians—viz., two in the Route, Messrs. Ker and O'Quin, who had formerly joined the sectaries, and four in the Lagan, Messrs. Cunningham, Drummond, Semple, and Wills or Wooll. This fact strikingly corroborates the statement of Adair in the text. The list given in the Appendix contains the names and residences of above one hundred and fifty ministers; and the sums payable to them for that year amount to nearly £13,000, the whole charge of the civil establishment being only £29,000.

worthy, and before the brethren of Down and Antrim had moved for themselves.<sup>14</sup>

“After the ministers had waited a considerable time, and were wearied with attendance, not only on persons in power, but whom they could not own as lawful powers, and in pursuit of a desire so contrary to the designs of those in authority, they returned and communicated their endeavours and answers to their brethren: who, though they saw it inconvenient to pass from their legal way of maintenance, and it was much contrary to their inclination to have any dependence on an usurping power, yet they considered it necessary that ministers be maintained. Their legal maintenance had been taken into the treasury, the tithes being then farmed by commissioners for that purpose; and had been thus violently sequestered by powers then uncontrollable. They considered, too, that what they got from the treasury was but getting their own again, and that it was still a maintenance out of the tithes that were due to ministers. The people, too, under so much oppression, were not able to bear further burdens, both lying under the weight of an army and paying tithes to the commissioners. To which was added this inducement that there was no proposal of any terms or conditions made to them upon which they should have this maintenance; but being a free gift, without any shadow of a snare in the manner of receiving it. Upon all these considerations they concluded to accept of that proposal, and were accordingly paid for two years by the treasury at Carrickfergus, and none excluded who sued for it. There was still a considerable number that received not this salary; because being then but new come in to the country and entered upon their trials, this way of maintenance was changed before they were settled."<sup>15</sup>

Not long after this temporary arrangement had been concluded with the Irish council, Henry Cromwell was again sent by the Protector to reside at Dublin, ostensibly to command the army in which he had formerly served under his father, but in reality to watch the motions of Fleetwood, and to control the selfishness and bigotry of the Baptists, who still composed the majority of the council. Though continued in the office of lord-deputy, Fleetwood was soon after recalled, and left Dublin with his wife and family in the beginning of September.<sup>16</sup> "He was too much an Anabaptist to carry on Cromwell's designs, now when he was aspiring to settle the supreme government in himself and posterity after him. For the Anabaptist principle was against a single person; and Fleetwood, being more addicted to his opinions than to his politics, could not homologate with his father-in-law in these

<sup>15</sup> It appears from the Montgomery MSS. (p. 235), and from Appendix, that several Irish bishops also, who were in the country, received salaries from the treasury out of the rents of the bishops' lands. Dr. Maxwell, bishop of Kilmore, who twenty years before had labelled the Presbyterians in his Latin verses (see Vol. I., p. 206), complimented Henry Cromwell, when lord-deputy, for his liberality, in an ode commencing in this fulsome strain :-- designs; on which Cromwell called him a milksop. The truth is, that, except his delusion with these Anabaptist principles, which then bore sway in the army, he seemed to be a person of great candour and of good inclinations in the main. He was much given to secret prayer, of a meek, condescending disposition, especially to those who were supposed to be godly; and so much of a seeming self-deniedness that he appeared not fit for the government, especially of an army so difficult to rule, and of a whole kingdom in such reeling times. These, his good qualities," adds Adair, with becoming candour, "I have borne witness of from some experience of them; and, besides I have the same from the testimony of other judicious persons who knew him better."

"Deliciæ humani generis, mitissime Prorex !"

The Leslies of Raphoe and Down accepted pensions of £120 per annum each from Cromwell.

Henry Cromwell arrived in Dublin, as "major-general of the army in Ireland," in the beginning of July, 1655, and was accompanied by his chaplain, Mr. Francis Roberts, an Independent. To counteract the influence of Patient and the Baptist preachers, he brought over several other Independent ministers, whom he settled, either as fellows in Trinity College, or as preachers in the city churches.<sup>17</sup> Of these, the more eminent were Dr. Thomas Harrison, who officiated in the cathedral of Christ Church; Stephen Charnock, author of the valuable work on the "Divine Attributes," who became a fellow of the college and a preacher in St. Werburgh's Church; and Mr. Samuel Mather, who was also a fellow, and, in the following year, was ordained as colleague to Dr. Winter in St. Nicholas' Church.<sup>18</sup> The Independent teachers in the other parts of the kingdom warmly congratulated Henry on his

<sup>17</sup> Of these churches Dr. Winter, the provost of the college, occupied that of St. Nicholas, and Mr. Robert Chambers that of St. Patrick. Some time after the settlement of the ministers mentioned in the text, the Rev. Edward Baynes was placed as preacher in St. John's, and the Rev. Samuel Cox, a Presbyterian, officiated at St. Catharine's. See Calamy's Cont., i., pp. 83, 84.

<sup>18</sup> Mr. Mather was ordained by Dr. Winter, Mr. Taylor, of Carrickfergus, and Mr. Jenner, of Drogheda, on the 6th of December, 1656. He was the teacher, and Winter the pastor, of the church.—Com. Journ., vii., 695. Besides the Independent ministers arrival. Taylor, of Carrickfergus, in particular, wrote a very flattering letter to him "in the name of the Church of God which is at Carrickfergus, with other godly and sober-spirited men in these parts," in which he alludes to the overbearing conduct of the Baptists, headed by their evangelist Patient, and rejoices in the prospect of their insolencies being checked. "We account it," he writes, "a special mercie that God hath taken of your father's spirit and put it upon you; and sent your honour as a healer of the breaches in this divided nation; wherein the overflowing interest of those that endeavoured (what in them lay) to null all churches, ordinances, and ministers (not to say magistrates also) which were not baptised into the same spirit and way with themselves, had almost, like a land-flood, carried all before it. In this healing worke your lordship can hardly deal with soe tender a hand but the impatience of your PATIENTS may expose your honour to misrepresentations and reproaches; but be of good courage, my lord, for your worke is with the Lord and your reward with your God."<sup>19</sup>

In the same proportion as Henry was flattered by the Independents, his mind was filled with jealousies of the Presbyterians. In the November after his arrival in Dublin, apprehending opposition to the government both from the leading Scots in Ulster and the disappointed and mortified Baptists,<sup>20</sup> he wrote for directions how to deal with these parties. His formerly noticed as settled at Waterford, Cork, and Limerick, I find a Mr. Cuthbert Harrison, preacher at Lurgan, from 1653; and in "Baxter's Life," by Sylvester (folio, book i., p. 169), there is a letter to Baxter, in the name of the associated churches in Ireland, dated from Dublin, July 5, 1655, and signed by Winter, Gilbert, of Waterford, Ed. Reynolds, J. Warren, and Thomas Osmonton, ministers, but their places of residence are not given. From Appendix, it appears that Mr. Reynolds was settled at Kilmallock, and Mr. Osmonton (or Osmington) at Ross.

<sup>20</sup> Various complaints of the hostility and disaffection of the Baptists during the latter part of this year occur in Thurloe's "State Papers" (iv., 197, 314, 327, and especially 348.) The following extract from a letter by Mr. Thomas Harrison, the Independent father, in reply, observed that the discontent of particular individuals ought not to discourage him. "Time and patience," Oliver wisely remarks, "may work them to a better frame of spirit, and bring them to see that which for the present seems to be hid from them; especially if they shall see your moderation and love towards them—which I earnestly desire you to studye and endeavour all that lyes in you. I am alsoe thinkinge of sendinge over to you a fitt person who may command the north of Ireland, which I beleeve stands in great need of one,<sup>21</sup> and am of your opinion that Trevor and Colonel Mervyn are very dangerous persons, and may be made the heads of a new rebellion. And, therefore, I would

minister who had come with Henry Cromwell from England, and had accompanied him in a visit which he paid after his arrival to the south of Ireland, will illustrate the religious dissensions then prevailing between the Baptists and Independents, and the great weight which the former party had acquired in the army:—"Being at Kilkenny with my lord [H. Cromwell] the 18th of last month [September], Mr. Brewster, Mr. Wood, Mr. Wells [all Independent ministers] and myself went solemnly to Mr. Blackwood, the oracle of the Anabaptists in Ireland, complaining of their totall withdrawals from us in public worship. He alleadged the cause thereof to be our not observing the order of the apostles by baptism; nevertheless, they could most of them sometimes joyne with us provided, first, that in a day of prayer they may speak last, that if anything be spoken against God or Christ or the truth, they might have an opportunity to bear witness against it, and the like liberty they desired at lectures, &c., &c. Secondly, that singing of psalmes be wholly forborne, &c., &c. This man is now fixed with the congregation at Dublin, and Mr. Patient appointed as an evangelist to preach up and downe the country. At Dublin they solemnly by excommunication delivered up to Satan a godly man for falling off, as they said, from the truthes of Christ to anti-Christian errors in joyning with Mr. Winter, and for no other cause in the world. The man sat next me the last Lord's-day in breaking of bread with that society, who forthwith received him upon due enquiry after their ejection of him: And yet alas how is this land shared out amongst persons of his perswasion, governors of towns and cities twelve at least, colonels ten, lieutenant colonels three or four, majors ten, captains nineteen or twenty, preachers in salary two, officers in the civil list twenty-three, and many of whom I never heard." (Thurloe, iv., 90, 91.) Similar complaints of the "horrid schisms of the Anabaptists" are made by Mr. Edward Wale, Independent minister at Waterford, in a letter to Mr. Harrison, in December, 1655. (Ibid. iv., 314.) A principal emissary of the Baptists was Captain Vernon, who was also quartermaster-general.—Ibid. iv., 315, 328.

have you move the councell, that they be secured in some very safe place, and the further out of their own countreyes the better."<sup>22</sup>

It was at this period that the Quakers made their appearance in Ulster, and disturbed all the settled churches with their violent fanaticism. The first person in Ulster who appears to have embraced their opinions was a William Edmundson, a native of the North of England, who settled as a dealer in the town of Antrim in 1652, and resided with his brother, a soldier in a troop of horse lately removed from Waterford and quartered in that town. On one of his mercantile visits to England in 1653, he met with George Fox and James Naylor, the celebrated apostles of Quakerism, and became a convert to this creed; and refusing to swear to the truth of his bills of lading on the arrival of his goods at Carrickfergus, public attention began to be directed to the peculiarities of this new sect. In the commencement of the year 1654, he removed from Antrim to Lurgan, where a Quaker meeting, the first in

<sup>22</sup> Thurloe, i. 725, 726. This hint from his father seems to have been promptly acted upon by Henry; for Taylor, writing within a month afterwards from Carrickfergus to "the reverend my verie much honoured friend Mr. Harrison, preacher of God's Word in Dublin," stated that he had lately perceived symptoms of disaffection among the Scots in Ulster, but hoped it was now "nipt in the bud by the securing some of our great men." In the same letter Taylor complains that Colonel Barrow, a violent Anabaptist, who had succeeded Venables in the command of the forces in this part of Ulster, and who resided at Carrickfergus, had, out of jealousy, suppressed a congratulatory address to Oliver in favour of Henry Cromwell, which had been got up by Lord Conway, Colonel Thomas Coote, Major Rawdon, and "subscribed by Mr. Robert Price and most of the chief men in Carrickfergus." It appears, also, that one Dix, a Papist preacher, who was in Kerry in 1653 (Ivimey, p. 241), and now settled at Belfast, had visited Carrickfergus, and effected a breach in the Independent Church under Taylor, who thus complains to his brother minister:—"Since I opposed Mr. Dicks his doctrine in public, Colonel Barrow absents himself from the public meeting. Here is great joy among the Anabaptists for the news of my lord deputie's [Fleetwood] return for Ireland. Captain Bonnel, one of the same Church with Colonel Barrow, went yesterday for England." In the conclusion of his letter, he requests his friend Harrison to procure a furlough for a few months for his brother-in-law, John Preston, who kept the packet-boats between Carrickfergus and Ayr, in Scotland, at a salary of £100 a year, and who had some urgent business to transact in Lancashire.—Thurloe, ut supra. [About that time Castle-Chichester, Broadisland, was a place of some trade, and the station from which the mails were despatched to Scotland.—M'Skimmis's Carrickfergus, 333, note. Belfast, 1829.]

Ulster, and composed of seven converts, was formally established. In the following year, John Tiffin, an itinerating preacher from England, made his way to Lurgan, in company with whom Edmundson began to frequent fairs and other places of public resort, and address the assembled people on the superiority of the new light; the abolition of tithes, Sabbaths, and ordinances; the corruption of a settled ministry and the evil of steeple-houses; the sin of hat-honour and the iniquity of oaths. They did not meet with much encouragement among the staid and well-instructed population of Ulster.

"At this time writes," writes Edmundson, "but few would lodge us in their houses. At Belfast, that town of great profession, there was but one of all the inns and public-houses that would lodge any of our friends, which was one Widow Partridge, who kept a public-house, and received us very kindly. There John Tiffin lodged, often endeavouring to get an entrance for truth in that town; but they resisted, shutting their ears, doors, and hearts against it."<sup>23</sup> The next companion, with whom he perambulated Ulster, was Richard Clayton. "We published the day of the Lord in Coleraine in the street, warning all to repent: we put up several little papers which we had written in several places; one we put on the worship-house door; but

<sup>23</sup> Extracted from a very curious, and, indeed, most interesting book, entitled, "A Journal of the Life, Travels, Sufferings, and Labour of Love in the work of the ministry, of that worthy elder and faithful servant of Jesus Christ, William Edmundson, who departed this life the 31st of the sixth month, 1712." London, 1715, 8vo, pp. 327. He was almost continually travelling among the Friends, not merely through all parts of England and Ireland, but also through North America and the West Indies, to which he made no less than three voyages between the years 1670 and 1684. In respect of his unwearied labours, he was another John Wesley. The latter, in one of his tours through Ireland, met with this journal, and perused it with much interest. "His opinions," says Wesley, "I leave; but what a spirit was there! What faith, love, gentleness, long-suffering! Could mistakes send such a man as this to hell? Not so. I am so far from believing this, that I scruple not to say, 'Let my soul be with the soul of Wm. Edmundson!'" ("Wes. Journ.," iv., 229.) In one of the commendatory testimonies prefixed to this book, dated from Lurgan, the 5th of the seventh month, 1713, and signed on behalf of the "Provincial Quarterly Meeting for Ulster," by Robert Hoope and Alexander Seaton, it is stated that "the first meeting of Friends in this nation was in Lurgan."—Pref., p. xviii.

the professors were highly offended, took and banished us over the water, giving charge that no boat should bring us back. So we travelled the road towards Londonderry, lodging that night in a cabin in the mountains ; the next day we came to Londonderry (we travelled on foot), and got two meetings there, where several received the truth. The governor was at one meeting, where he was convinced, confessing it to be the truth that we declared, and whilst we staid he was very loving. Then we travelled to Strabane, Clogher, Omagh, and Six-mile-cross, to Dungannon, so to Kilmore, in the county of Armagh ; and thence to Lurgan. The next itinerants were two female friends also from England, Ann Gould and Julian Westwood, who visited Londonderry, "having some drawings to that place ; after some service done for the Lord there they travelled to Coleraine, so through the Scotch country to a place called Clough all on foot in the winter time, wading rivers and dirty miry ways." Here one of the sisters took ill, and Edmundson, guided solely by the inward light, discovered them at Clough, conducted them with much difficulty to Connor, and thence by way of Carrickfergus and Belfast to his house at Lurgan. These well-meaning but violent sectaries spread more extensively through the southern than the northern parts of the kingdom ; and by their vehement denunciations against the ministry and magistracy, and their refusal both of oaths and of tithes, at length drew upon themselves the notice of the council of state. Directions were accordingly issued to the municipal authorities of the several towns, especially in the southern province, to imprison the more noted of these itinerants, and transport them to England. These orders, little consonant with the boasted tolerance of the Independents, were executed with much unnecessary and unwarrantable rigour, and subjected many individuals to severe sufferings.<sup>24</sup>

The course of affairs under Henry Cromwell now moved on very tranquilly. His moderation and firmness gained the confidence of the more bigoted Anabaptists,<sup>25</sup> and the Independents<sup>26</sup> and Presbyterians pursued their respective objects in peace. Shortly after his arrival, all parties cordially concurred in sending contributions, amounting to nearly eleven hundred pounds, to the Protestants of Savoy, then cruelly persecuted by their Roman Catholic sovereign.<sup>27</sup>

During this season of repose and religious prosperity, when

seventy-seven imprisonments occurred, and nearly £50 were extorted from them, "besides goods taken unvalued, and several large fines imposed." But these severities gradually abated, and during the next four years only thirty imprisonments took place. See a small book, entitled, "A Compendious View of some extraordinary Sufferings of the people called Quakers, both in person and substance, in the kingdom of Ireland: from the year 1655 to the end of the reign of King George the First. By A. Fuller and T. Holms." Dublin, 1711, 8vo, pp. 135. For the orders of the council against them, see Warner, ii., p. 271.

<sup>25</sup> In October, 1656, Henry Cromwell, writing to Secretary Thurloe, says, "I have since my returne bin more courted by the Anabaptists than formerly. Mr. Patient and some others, whoe had not bin with me of a longe time before, came to vissit me, and expressed much as to their satisfaction with my management of thinges here."—Thurloe, i., 731.

<sup>26</sup> In June, 1656, an address was published by Winter's church, in Dublin, declaring their cordial approbation of Henry and his government, on the following grounds:—"1. For his equall justice to all, and mercy to the poore. 2. For his prudent and loving carriage to all that feare God, though of different judgments; endeavouring to preserve unity and love amongst them. 3. For the countenance that himself and family gives to all Gods publike ordinances, by theire constant and reverent attendance on them. 4. For the respect, countenance, and encouragement that (in a speciall manner) hee gives to all the godly ministers of the Gospel. And wee doe alsoe declare, and that upon good ground, that generally all the sober-minded Christians throughout this whole land, are of the same mind with us herein." This address is signed by Samuel Winter, pastor, with D. Hutchinson and Thomas Hooke, elders, both mentioned in the next note, and forty-one members of the church, among whom are John Price and Gamaliel Marsden, at that time fellows of the college.—Nickoll's "State Papers," pp. 137, 138.

<sup>27</sup> In the "Distinct and faithful account of all the receipts, &c., of moneys collected in England, Wales, and Ireland, for the relief of the poor distressed Protestants in the valleys of Piedmont," &c., printed by order of Cromwell, in 1658, is the following entry, the only one relating to Ireland:—"1655—56, Jan. 29. Received of Thomas Hooke, late mayor of the city of Dublin, in Ireland, and of Daniel Hutchinson and John Preston, alderman of the said city, and treasurers appointed for the receiving all moneys collected in the realm of Ireland, for the distressed Protestants of Savoy, returned by bill of exchange, £1037 6s. 3d." The collection began in July, 1655. On this subject, see Thurloe, iii., 612 and 710; iv., 443 and 484. The total amount collected in Britain was £48,037 7s. 3d. Cromwell's vigorous and successful interference on behalf of this persecuted people was one of the noblest enterprises of his government.

"the churches had rest throughout all the land, and increased in number daily," the indefatigable JOHN LIVINGSTON once more, and for the last time,* visited Ireland. During the previous winter he had been earnestly pressed to remove to Ulster. "The parish of Killinchy, in Ireland," he states in his life, "where I had formerly been, sent a commissioner once and again with a call to me to return to them.<sup>28</sup> If I could have obtained fair loosing, my mind inclined somewhat to have gone, because of the present distractions in Scotland, and because that I thought Ireland had more need and more appearance of success. The synod of Merse and Teviotdale refused to loose me, and five or six ministers in other parts, on whose judgments I relied, dissuaded me; only they advised me that I should first make a visit to Ireland. Therefore, in summer, 1656, I went over; and our friends in Teviotdale put themselves to the trouble to send Colonel Ker, and Mr. Smith, minister at Oxnom, along, to see the case of Ireland. When I came I could not get preaching in Killinchy any way as in former times; and that I took as a declaration of the Lord's mind that I should not go to settle there: yea, I did not find above two or three families, nor above ten or twelve persons, that had been in that parish when I was there. So great a change had the rebellion and devastation brought, that all almost were new inhabitants. [I staid nine or ten weeks.<sup>29</sup>] I preached in several parts and at some communions; and was at a great meeting of their Presbytery in the north, which was more like a synod; where were thirty or thirty-six ministers, and ruling-elders from sixty or eighty parishes; and that Presbytery was divided in three several committees, that met apart in three several parts of the country. One of these committees had twenty or twenty-four vacant parishes which they supplied, sending two or three ministers at once to visit for two or three months, and after that others by turns. Afterwards some more ministers were placed in the North of Ireland, so that in all they were above sixty; and Killinchy was well provided by Mr. Michael Bruce.<sup>30</sup> During my abode in Ireland, being occasionally at Dublin, the councill there urged me to accept a charge in Dublin, and offered me two hundred pounds sterling a year. But that was to me no temptation, seeing I was not loosed from Ancrum; and if I had been, I was resolved rather to settle at Killinchy, among the Scotts in the north, than any where else."<sup>31</sup>

[* Many of the descendants of this good man still remain. In Baird's "Religion in the United States of America," p. 134 (Glasgow, 1844), there is the following statement:—"Among others who came by way of Holland to America was Robert Livingston, ancestor to the numerous and distinguished family of that name to be found in various parts of America, but particularly in the State of New York, and son of that pious and celebrated minister, the Rev. John Livingston."]

During this visit, Livingston and his companion Colonel Ker accidentally met with Edmundson, the Quaker, then imprisoned at Armagh. The latter has recorded the results of their meeting, with the marvellous though characteristic self-complacency of that well-meaning enthusiast. "About this time I was put in prison at Ardmagh for the testimony of truth before the common gaol was repaired, so I was a prisoner in a little room in the gaoler's house. Though I was weak and contemptible in my own eyes, yet the Lord was with me, his power and dread was my strength and refuge. I was a terror to the gaoler and his wife, for if I had come out of my room where the gaoler was, he would have hung down his head, not looking me in the face ; his wife would sometimes be tormented and cry out, for my presence was a torment to her, though I said nothing. At this time there came a Presbyterian minister out of Scotland pretending to visit the churches ; there was in his company one Colonel Ker ; this priest came to the gaoler's house to lodge, for he kept a public-house. 'Twas on a seventh day of the week he came ; I was then fallen sick and in bed. That priest lodged in the next room, so that I could hear what they said. Towards evening many Presbyterians came to visit their minister, and he read a chapter and expounded it unto them, sung a psalm and prayed ; after which they left him that night.

<sup>30</sup> Mr. Bruce, by his mother, was great-grandson of the celebrated Robert Bruce, ordained as one of the ministers of Edinburgh, in the year 1587. He was induced to settle at Killinchy by the advice of Livingston, who "sent with him an ample commendatory letter, dated Ancrum, July 3, 1657, and directed to Captain James Moore, of Ballybrega, to be communicated to the congregation."—Reid's Sermon, ut supra Mr. Bruce was publicly ordained in the church of Killinchy in month of October following.

“ The next morning early, being the first day of the week, Colonel Ker came into the priest's room and asked him, what was the meaning of the Apostle John's speaking so much of abiding in Christ ? and further asked, how we must abide in Christ ? But the priest did not answer him ; therefore he was under trouble and dissatisfaction. At this the Lord moved me to rise, put on my cloaths, and speak to the priest as he went to the worship, for they passed by the door of my room. So I arose and put on my cloaths, the Lord's power strengthening me : many of the chief of the Presbyterians came to accompany the priest to their place of worship. I stood in my room-door, and as he went by I asked him, ‘ If he were a minister of Christ ? ’ He answered, ‘ Yes : ’ then I asked, ‘ What was the reason he did not understand the doctrine of the former ministers of Christ ? ’ But he was smitten, and making me no answer, got away. So I laid down again, being sick. The next morning early, Colonel Ker came to my bed-side, saying he heard I was in restraint for my conscience ; adding, he was a man of tender conscience and sympathized with my sufferings, therefore came to see me, desiring to have some discourse with me ; but he heard I was not well, yet if I would arise he offered to help me on with my cloaths. I told him I would arise and put on my cloaths, for I felt the Lord's power strengthening me. So he went out of the room; and this was but an apology to get an opportunity for the priest, and several of their elders and disputants to run me down, and to glory over truth and friends. I got up and dressed myself. Presently the priest, Col. Ker, Col. Cunningham, and a great many of their leading men came into the house, more than the room would hold. I was greatly afraid of my own weakness for truth's sake; therefore I prayed to the Lord in secret for his aid and assistance, and he was pleased to fill me with his Spirit, being mouth and wisdom to me; so that the Lord's power and the testimony of his blessed truth was over them. The priest was confounded in himself, and being restless went out and came in several times. When the priest had done, then Colonel Cunningham began with me; he was a justice of the peace and a great disputant. We discoursed of several things too tedious to mention the particulars; but the Lord's power foiled him, his mouth was stopped, and he sat silent. Then was my heart and tongue full of the word of life, to declare the way of truth to them, and they went away quiet."<sup>32</sup> Edmundson, it may be added, was soon after liberated. He then relinquished his shop in Lurgan, and took a farm in the county of Cavan, near Belturbet, for no other purpose than to obtain an opportunity of refusing to pay tithe, and enjoy the satisfaction of suffering for that testimony.

Though the Presbyterians of Ulster were protected by Henry Cromwell in the exercise of their discipline and the observance of public worship, and though all ministers who applied enjoyed the State endowment without any ensnaring engagement, they were, notwithstanding, viewed with suspicion and jealousy. Reports of their being ready to espouse the cause of the exiled king were frequently circulated; complaints were made of their keeping up a separate interest in the north;<sup>33</sup> orders were issued to Monck at Edinburgh to permit no Scots to remove to Ulster without special permission;<sup>34</sup> and Colonel Cooper, the governor of Carrickfergus, and the chief in command in the north-eastern parts of the province, was instructed to keep a watchful eye on all their movements. Nor was it long before an occasion arose which brought them into collision with the ruling powers. The Irish council, following the example of that in England, frequently issued proclamations for the general observance of days of fasting and of thanksgiving. Thus, they ordered a fast to be kept on the 8th of October, in Ireland, "to seeke a blessing from the Lord upon the counccills and undertakings of his highness and the parliament," then recently assembled;<sup>35</sup> and [the 29th of the same month was observed, by order of the parliament, throughout the three kingdoms, for a similar purpose. A day of thanksgiving was in like manner appointed by the parliament to be observed in Ireland on the 5th of November, on account of the successes obtained in the war with Spain.<sup>36</sup> And on the discovery of Sexby's plot for the assassination of Cromwell, Friday, the 13th of February, 1657, was ordered to be kept throughout the whole empire as a day of thanksgiving for the safety of the Protector.<sup>37</sup> These and other similar days the Presbytery uniformly refused to observe: the grounds of this refusal and the consequent interference of the State will be best narrated in the words of Adair :—

“The Presbytery in these parts were hardly put to it by Henry and his council to observe their public fasts and thanksgivings on account of the losses or victories of that party. The brethren, never judging themselves incorporated with them, durst not espouse their course, especially these solemn appearances before God ; knowing that this government, though now flourishing and pretending some owning of religion, yet was iniquity at the bottom. The brethren not joining in these days of theirs, were narrowly observed by the friends of that party in the country, and account transmitted to Dublin. Wherefore threatening letters and full of animosity were written to the Presbytery by Henry himself ; and some particular brethren were charged by letters from the council to appear before them at Dublin, which they did.<sup>38</sup> Others were partly threatened, partly insinuated upon at home. The Presbytery sent up two, Mr. Hart and Mr. Greg, on purpose to endeavour to allay the present fury of the governors, especially of Henry, who at first so much professed to be our friend. There, after long discourse from Henry, upbraiding their ingratitude and shewing the reasonableness of the demand, Mr. Greg did plainly tell them that we could not in conscience join with them in their fasts and thanksgivings ; and that it was no worldly consideration but conscience that kept us at that distance. However, this did not satisfy Henry, but rather increased his choler, and brought from him harsh and threatening expressions against the whole brethren.<sup>39</sup>

“I have lately received intelligence from severall hands that the Scots in Ulster, and even their ministers alsoe in our pay, did decline keeping the day of thanksgivinge joyntly by Parliament for your highness’ deliverance ; but did on the other side keep a day of humiliation among themselves, by what authoritie I know not ; which I take to be noe symptome of their good meaninge. I have communicated this business to the councill in relation to that carriage of the ministers.”—Thurloe, vi., 143.

With this, these two brethren were at that time dismissed, and returned home with no account of the governors' satisfaction. Yet after that came divers orders for keeping their days upon emergent occasions, which the brethren still waived. And being again put to it, the brethren of Down particularly did give the reasons why they could not observe their days: partly considering that the causes thereof were matters which concerned that party and the carrying on their own designs, in which others beside themselves were not concerned; and partly because they were imposed by persons not having lawful power. Besides, that they were not lawful magistrates who in some cases have enjoined fasts; there was in these parts a church representative and constituted, whose duty it was to consider the causes of these public solemnities, and accordingly to call the people together to exercises of that nature. This plainness did so startle the council that it was feared he, who had once professed so much friendship, should turn an enemy. This was the special difficulty that the brethren then met with from the ruling powers."

Traces of the jealousy with which the proceedings of the Scots were viewed by the State are occasionally discernible during the remainder of this year. Two instances may suffice to show the anxious, though not vexatious, vigilance with which the least movement of the Presbyterians was observed.

Thus, in the month of June, Colonel Cooper, while attending his parliamentary duties in London, received information

301 :—"Mr. Greg and Mr. Hart were called before Henry Cromwell himself, and asked the reasons why they and their brethren did not observe the fasts and thanksgivings appointed by his authority. In answer to which they pleaded 'that their consciences did not allow 'em to comply with any power that was against the constitution and lawful magistracy of the kingdom.' He was much incensed against 'em by this answer, and charged 'em with ingratitude, meaning that they had '100 each of them per annum, from the government. But they never looked upon that salary as any obligation upon them to own the government; for the usurpers had taken the tythes from 'em, and after some years gave 'em that hundred pounds per annum; which they accepted of, not as a gift from the government, but as a part of their own to which they had a prior title, and of which they had been deprived by the usurpers."

that the Presbyterians of Carrickfergus had invited the Rev. John Greg, who had been obliged, in the year 1649, to abandon his charge there and settle in the county of Down, to become once more their minister. He immediately writes from London to Henry Cromwell in the following terms:—"Having the opportunity of this messenger, I am bold to inform you of what I hear from Carrickfergus. The town it seems hath lately chosen one Mr. Greg to be their minister, and are strongly endeavouring to have him settled with them. But indeed I think it very unsafe he should be admitted into that town; he is a man of a very turbulent spirit and extremely disaffected to the present government. He was banished Ireland, as I take it, in General Monck's time; and, as I have heard, was so exceeding active against the English army that, if they could have taken him, they had matter enough against him to have put him to death. And since my coming to Ireland I have had informations divers times against him, of very seditious expressions he hath used both in praying and preaching; and the town of Carrickfergus hath many Scots in it, and the English there have too much a Scotch spirit, by reason of Mr. Greg's formerly being their minister. I do humbly conceive that it's much for the peace of Ireland, in all towns of strength at least, no Scotch minister be admitted, except he be a known friend to the present government: and I hope your lordship and the council will not admit them into Derry, Coleraine, Carrickfergus, and Belfast. And if it could well be done it were advisable that no Scotchman might live in those towns, at least for some years; for your lordship knows, there is more danger to be expected from that interest than the Irish in Ulster."<sup>40</sup> Colonel Cooper returned to his command at Car-

<sup>40</sup> Thurloe, vi, 349. There is little doubt that Cooper's informant with respect to these affairs was Taylor, the Independent preacher, who would not much relish the idea of having a popular Presbyterian minister settled either beside himself in Carrickfergus or beside the other Independents who had securely nestled themselves in the quarters of the army at Derry, Coleraine, and Belfast.

rickfergus in the month of September, and succeeded in obstructing the settlement not only of Mr. Greg in that town, but of other Presbyterian ministers in the garrison towns which he had specified. In the following month, he took occasion again to write to Henry Cromwell respecting the proceedings of the Presbytery, of whose character he appears to have at length formed a correct estimate. It seems that the Rev. Henry Livingston, minister of Drumbo, on the confines of the counties of Down and Antrim, had, in some unbecoming manner, reflected on the principles or character of some of the surrounding sects—probably of the Independents in the neighbouring towns of Belfast or Lisburn—and that a formal complaint of his conduct, with the depositions on which it was founded, had been deemed sufficiently important to be transmitted to Dublin. “I perceive,” writes the vigilant governor of Carrickfergus to Henry Cromwell, “that the examinations concerning Mr. Leviston, came to your hands, since which time there hath been a meeting of the Presbytery, and have considered of the carriage of Mr. Leviston, and given him a farther reproof, and have appointed Mr. Drysdale and Mr. Hart to wait upon your lordship to give you a full account of the same. I hope what hath been done may be of good consequence to teach men of different persuasions, in the things of God, to carry it peaceably towards one another. The Scotch ministers do promise very fair, and according to my observation and experience may with more ease be led than driven; and the tenderness your lordship shows them is the likeliest way to gain them.”<sup>41</sup>

Whether the more intimate knowledge of the Presbyterian clergy which Henry acquired from these communications led him to form a more correct opinion of them, or an accession of power, which was soon after conferred upon him, enabled him to act with greater freedom, certain it is, that from this period the Presbyterians were treated with confidence and favour. In the beginning of November his father appointed him to be lord-deputy of Ireland, and into this high office he was publicly sworn on the 24th of that month. Possessing now more ample powers, and freed from the control of the former council, several of whom were of the Anabaptist faction, he employed his influence in assiduously endeavouring to promote the religious peace and prosperity of the country committed to his charge.

One of his first measures was to settle the maintenance of ministers throughout the kingdom on some uniform and stable foundation, that an additional number of efficient men might be induced to remove to Ireland. Hitherto Fleetwood's scheme of collecting the tithes into the treasury, and paying salaries to the ministers, though generally enforced in Ulster, had been only partially adopted in the other provinces. In some places the clergy collected the tithe, as formerly, independently of the State; in other places they were supported partly by tithe and partly by salaries from the treasury; and in many parts of the kingdom no adequate maintenance could be procured for a resident ministry: while the embarrassments of the revenue were such as not only to prevent the grant of additional salaries, but to delay the payment of those already granted. Under these circumstances, Henry Cromwell, in the month of March, 1658, summoned a number of the more eminent Presbyterian and Independent ministers to meet in Dublin, and confer with him on the subject of their maintenance.<sup>42</sup> The object of this meeting he thus discloses to his brother-in-law, Fleetwood, who had doubted the propriety of altering the plan which had been laid down:—"I perceive by your last (wherein you express that we have designed to alter the ways of the ministers' maintenance) that you have been fully and particularly informed of that affair.

I hope (that to bring things into their proper and legal channel, and thereby to gratify the greater number both of good ministers and other persons,) to make way for the encouragement of more ministers to come over into this land, which doth so much want them: little more than a third part thereof being as yet supplied; and although it be so, the maintenance set apart for them as it is now managed falling short two or three thousand pounds even to pay this quarterly salary to those upon the place;<sup>43</sup> and it being impossible to improve the maintenance any other way than by putting them that are free to receive tythes in kind upon their tythes, and making other provisions for those who conscientiously scruple that way of maintenance, although they are contented that the State be their stewards to set, let, and gather the profits and themselves receive the very specific money which ariseth out of tythes,

<sup>43</sup> In an abstract of the whole revenue of Ireland for the years 1656 and 1657, given in Thurloe, vi., 596, 597, it appears that the salaries for those two years to "ministers and schoolmasters" amounted to £34,141 13s. 8d. From a document in Thurloe, v., 731, showing the revenue of Ireland for the former of those years, I select the following summary of the receipts from Ulster :—

"An abstract of the several branches of the revenue in the respective counties in Ireland, belonging to his Highness and the Commonwealth, set this present year, 1656."

instead of tythes in specie ; which all of them hath done ever since that revenue hath been put into a distinct treasury, for so it hath been now above these twelve months. I say I hope upon these and many other considerations it will not be looked upon as an evil design thus to settle the ministers, having regard as aforesaid to those that do soberly and not wantonly scruple that way. I wish as fair a way lay open for answering the necessities of the State as this will those of the Church.”<sup>44</sup>

The projected meeting accordingly took place on the 23d of April. “About thirty ministers,” writes Cromwell, “have met upon my invitation in Dublin to treat about the regulation and improvement of their maintenance, which hath hitherto been carried in a mongrel way between salary and tythes.” The Presbyterian ministers who attended were the Rev. John Greg, then of Newtownards, the Rev. Thomas Hall, of Larne, and the Rev John Hart, of Taughboyne, near Derry. The meeting continued during nearly five weeks. The subsequent measures adopted by the deputy are thus stated by Adair :— “He fell on a way of restoring ministers to their legal maintenance. For this end he issued forth commissions to gentlemen in divers counties in Ireland so to mould parishes that there might be a competent maintenance for each minister, not within a hundred pounds if possible. This was done in many places, and their diligence returned to Dublin and approved. And where the hundred pounds fell short in any particular parish, it was to be made up out of the treasury of tythes, by special command of the treasurer. But this, through the uncertainty of these times, came to nought before it could be well effected.”

But besides this subject of ministerial maintenance Henry submitted to the consideration of the assembled ministers several other important matters. He requested their advice respecting the instruction and conversion of the Roman Catholic population, the promoting of peace and unity among all godly ministers though of different churches, the due observance of the Sabbath, and the suppression of heresy and profaneness.<sup>45</sup> During their meeting they presented to him a complimentary address, acknowledging his kindness;<sup>46</sup> and at the conclusion of their sittings on the 26th of May, they submitted to him a series of resolutions, on the subjects committed to them, in which, with one exception, they had unanimously concurred. "The ministers," he states in one of his letters, "that I called together about their maintenance, have this day

<sup>45</sup> Not long after this meeting, and probably in consequence of H. Cromwell's suggestions, the ministers of the metropolis and its vicinity formed themselves into an association or synod, and agreed upon a declaration of their faith, worship, and government, which they published under this ample title:—"The agreement and resolution of the ministers of Christ within the city of Dublin and province of Leinster, whose names are subscribed, in order to their entering into and walking together in a brotherly association. Had the 22nd day of February, 1658 [9] at Dublin, for furthering of a real and thorough reformation of persons, families, and congregations in all matters of religion according to the written Word of God." Dub., 1659, 4to, pp. 14. This "agreement" is an attempt to combine the principles of Independency and Presbyterianism into one system, and is well worthy of being more extensively known than it probably is, as I had never heard of the existence of such a document till I accidentally met with a copy. It consists of five sections, with copious Scripture references. In the first section, the subscribing ministers, whose names are unfortunately not given, "decline and abhor" all blasphemy, heresy, schism, &c.; they also resolve "to disavow, and with all prudence and faithfulness (as we have just occasion to oppose Popery, Prelacy not only as it is described in the Solemn League and Covenant, but also as it is cried up by some in these days under the specious disguise of moderated, regulated, or primitive Episcopacy, and all inventions of men tending thereunto), Arminianism, Socinianism, &c." In the fifth section, they agree to use "the Shorter and Larger Catechisms of the Westminster Assembly (unless some particular brother shall think some other catechism more convenient for his congregation), that so the fundamentals of true Christian religion, by one and the same form of sound words throughout the whole city and province, may be rendered familiar to both young and old, &c." In the same section, they further "receive and hold fast that excellent Confession of Faith comprised in thirty and three chapters, and compiled by the Assembly of Divines for these three nations, as their own Confession of Faith in all the said congregations (reserving only to some of us our liberty of judgment about a few expressions touching discipline laid down in that Confession); it being a form of sound words very consonant to the Holy Scriptures, and of special use both for preserving of the purity and unity of the faith amongst us, and for obviating of both old and novel errors."

<sup>46</sup> This address, with the signatures of nineteen ministers attached to it, I discovered among the Lansdowne MSS. in the British Museum. As it is an interesting document, and has never been printed, I have inserted a copy of it in the Appendix.

given me a large paper in reference to several matters offered by me to their consideration; and are now returning to their respective homes parting with much love, having during the time of their being together kept a good understanding and mutual respect and tenderness one towards another; though I must tell you endeavours have not been wanting, amongst persons of no mean quality here, to blow up the coals and frustrate those good ends we aimed at.”<sup>47</sup> Cromwell here alludes to Steele, the lord chancellor, who had placed himself at the head of the Independents, and endeavoured to render them discontented with Henry’s government; the strict impartiality of which was displeasing to that aspiring party. “I wish,” observes Henry, writing in the month of June, “I could truly say that the Independents are not dissatisfied. It may be some of them thought they should ride when they had thrown the Anabaptist out of the saddle.” But he very properly adds, “I must neither respect persons, nor parties, nor rumours, so as to be thereby diverted from an equal distribution of respect and justice to all; though I hope I shall always have a due care of all (under what form soever) in whom I see the least appearance of godliness.”<sup>48</sup>

From the prosecution of his plans for the improvement of Ireland, Henry was soon diverted, by the political changes consequent on the unexpected death of his father. Oliver Cromwell died at Whitehall on his favourite day—the 3rd of September;<sup>49</sup> and his eldest son, Richard, was proclaimed in Dublin, on the 10th of that month, as his successor in the Protectorate. On this sudden change in the government, Henry immediately and earnestly applied to be relieved from his charge in Ireland ;<sup>50</sup> but, owing to his influence over the army, and his general and growing popularity, his services could not be dispensed with. To induce him to remain, his brother raised him to the highest dignity which the one could enjoy or the other confer—that of lord-lieutenant—and, on the 2nd of November, he was solemnly sworn into this important office. No change, however, appears to have taken place in his administration of Irish affairs. The kingdom continued to enjoy unusual tranquillity, and in no part of the empire did there exist a more cordial or general submission to the new Protector.

This period of internal peace was diligently improved by the Presbytery. The ministers were incessantly occupied in visiting remote congregations, and settling ordained pastors in the many parishes which were still vacant in Ulster. The several committees into which the Presbytery were subdivided met together frequently; and wherever there appeared an opportunity, however remote, for the preaching and planting of the Gospel, it was cheerfully embraced. “Soon after,” writes Adair, “there was a Presbytery at Ballymena, where all the five meetings were present, on April 8, 1659. Some called it the General Presbytery, and some called it a Synod.<sup>51</sup> Here Lieutenant-Colonel William Cunningham, of whom we

The curious fact, which appears to be satisfactorily attested therein, must relate to the synod mentioned in the text, as there could have been no such meeting held in 1650, which is therefore a mistake for 1659. “MEM<sup>m</sup>. I heard both Dr. Gilbert Rule, Principall of Edinburgh College, and Mr. Archibald Hamilton (an ancient Presbyterian minister in the north of Ireland) relate the following passage in the time of King Charles the 2d's reign, viz.—That in the year 1650 [59] there was a meeting or synod of Presbyterian ministers in the north of Ireland. Among whom one ancient minister satt seemingly drowsy while the rest were debating some matters before 'em. Upon which, being ask't if hee were taking a nap, hee reply'd, 'No, his soul had been ravisht with the prospect of the happy days the Church of God in these kingdoms should enjoy under a Prince of Orange.' have spoken before, being then tenant to Henry Cromwell, at Portumna, in the west of Ireland,<sup>52</sup> came with a letter and message from Henry Cromwell, desiring Mr. John Greg should be sent to that country in order to planting the Gospel in those bounds, where at present were only Papists and a few high Prelatists and Anabaptists. He promised in his letter to give them all the encouragement in his power, for this end that the purity of religion and good principles might be settled among the people there. This motion was thought to come especially from Cunningham, who at that time had a considerable interest in those parts under Henry : as also divers others had, who wished their lands planted with British and sober persons ; which they saw they could not so well do except ministers were settled there. Beside, where they were to have their own residences they loved to enjoy Gospel ordinances under faithful ministers. The Presbytery, in compliance with this motion and desire of the then chief governor, did name some of their number, viz., Mr. Greg, Mr. Shaw, Mr. Cornwall, and Mr. Wallace,<sup>53</sup> to visit that country for three months, to see if there appeared any hope of doing good ; but only on the condition that they be provided and conducted to those places where they might be useful. But the motion was thereafter forgotten and did vanish ; Henry being taken up with grand

Gabriel Cornwall at (I believe) Ballywillan, near Coleraine. I may add that Jeremy O'Quin, of Billy (also near Coleraine), who has been frequently referred to in the preceding chapters, died on the last day of January, 1657—58. The following is a copy of the epitaph on his tombstone :—"Epicedium Reverendii Pastoris Jer. O'Quinii.

O'Quinus, pastor mollis, requiescit in urna hac, affairs, and not being confident of our brethren that they would be for his purpose, that is, instruments to engage people to his government: and the ministers who were named having no forwardness for that undertaking."

These "grand affairs" which now occupied Henry's attention arose out of the progress of events in England, and were indeed of pressing urgency. Richard Cromwell soon proved wholly incapable of holding the reins of government that the fortunes of his father had put into his hands. The parliament, which the embarrassments of the finances had compelled him to summon in January, was hastily dissolved by him in April. The army became again predominant, and easily wrested the power out of the feeble hands of the irresolute Protector. In the beginning of May, the old or Rump Parliament, which had been dismissed by Oliver in 1653, resumed their sittings, and the government became once more republican. On the 7th of June, this parliament voted that Ireland should no longer be governed by one person, but by commissioners appointed by themselves. In the following week, letters were ordered to be written to Henry Cromwell, directing him to repair to London, and empowering Miles Corbet, the chief-baron, and Steele, the chancellor, who had been nominated commissioners, to conduct the government until the arrival of their colleagues, Jones, Basill, and Goodwin. These letters were anticipated by Henry, who, on the 15th of June, wrote to the speaker resigning the lord-lieutenancy, and immediately withdrew to England.<sup>54</sup> On the 9th of July, Ludlow, the celebrated

<sup>54</sup> Henry Cromwell retired into private life, and resided on his estate in Cambridge-shire. Here he spent the remainder of his days, descending from the toilsome grandeur of governing men to the humble and happy occupation of husbandry." He died there on 23rd of March, 1674.—Noble, i. 213. At the Restoration, Richard Cromwell was obliged to fly to the Continent to escape his creditors. After twenty years' residence abroad, principally at Geneva and Paris, he returned to England, and resided privately at Cheshunt, within a few miles of London. Once, when in the metropolis, curiosity led him to visit the House of Lords; and being asked by one of the officers, who was unacquainted with him, if he had ever seen anything like it before. "Never," he replied, republican, was appointed to the chief command of the army in Ireland; and for some reason now unknown, perhaps on account of his opposition to the Baptists, who once more enjoyed a temporary ascendancy, Dr. Winter, in the following month, was ordered by the parliament "to repair into England and attend their pleasure."<sup>55</sup>

These fluctuations in the government were not, in the first instance, felt in Ulster. "Meantime," says Adair, "the Church of Christ, with its ministers in this part of the country, being settled on their former basis, remained in peace and liberty as much as ever; beholding their late oppressors a reeling and mouldering away, and in that fury destroying one another; and their own hands bringing to ruin that which they had, for a while, been building on iniquity. While in the meantime congregations were planting and the interest of Christ spreading very remarkably in these parts, by the settling of ministers in congregations not before planted." But the crisis speedily arrived when it was apparent no other alternative remained for the settlement of the nation than the restoration of the exiled King. In the first movements towards this event, the Presbyterians, then the most united and considerable body in the three kingdoms, took the lead. "The motion of bringing home the king," writes Adair, who had access to the best information, "began first among the most grave and wise ministers in the Church of Scotland, who communicated it to some principal noblemen; and thereafter under secrecy General Monck was communed with in it, who accorded to the proposals made and had their support from Scotland for the same undertaking, and the promise of more if there were need thereof. The same spirit did, after Monk's entering into England, actuate that party there. For all along in his march to London they encouraged him and owned him; and being there, it was the Presbyterian covenanted party who brought him into credit, and their ministers brought the whole city to own him."

<sup>55</sup> Commons' Journ., vii., 757, 13th August. It may be added that the new Anabaptist commissioners, on the 11th of August, ordered Lieutenant-Colonel Bryan Smyth, the successor of Cooper as governor of Carrickfergus, to send up the celebrated Jeremy Taylor, who had removed to the neighbourhood of Lisburn, in June, 1658, to answer the complaint of one Tandy for having baptised with the sign of the cross, &c. He accordingly went up to Dublin about December; but in consequence of the subsequent changes in the government, he was immediately dismissed.

Further revolutions had, in the meantime, occurred. The Rump or Republican Parliament, whose sittings had been again interrupted by military violence in the month of October, resumed their sittings in the latter end of December. They then recalled the Irish commissioners who had favoured the usurpation of the army-faction. They approved of the conduct of Sir Charles Coote and Sir Hardress Waller in obtaining possession of the castle of Dublin, and other important garrisons throughout the kingdom;<sup>56</sup> and, on the 19th of January, 1660, they appointed these officers, with three others, new commissioners for Ireland.<sup>57</sup> Their own power, however, was speedily terminated. On the 21st of February, the members who had been formerly secluded by the army, under Colonel Pride, resumed their seats in parliament under the protection and by the orders of Monk; and, the violent republicans having retired in disgust, the Presbyterian or constitutional party became once more predominant.

<sup>56</sup> On the 13th of December, the castle was surprised by the companies of Captains Foyer and Bond, "one of whose men softly knocking at the gates, the sentinel opened the door, and as he opened it, the rest presently rushed in, and on a sudden surprised the whole, and turning out the guards which were in, possess themselves of the castle." They took prisoners the three commissioners, Jones, Corbet, and Tomlison, with Colonel Richard Lawrence, Lieutenant-Colonel Henry Jones, Mr. Standish, the treasurer, and Captain Tombes, the storekeeper. (See the Weekly Post, No. 35.) On the following day, the principal officers in Dublin published a paper, declaring their adherence to the Rump Parliament, entitled, "A Declaration of several officers of the army in Ireland, on behalf of themselves and those under their commands, holding forth their steadfast resolutions to adhere to the parliament in defence of its privileges, and the just rights and liberties of the people of these nations as men and Christians." It is dated from Dublin Castle, December 14, 1659, and is signed by Sir Hardress Waller, and twenty-one other officers. See Mercurius Politicus, No. 600, pp. 987—88.

The Long Parliament, thus restored to the state in which it was prior to the death of Charles I., speedily despatched the more urgent business of the nation; and having summoned another parliament to meet in the month of April following, they dissolved themselves by their own act on the 16th of March, after having sat, though with frequent interruptions, during the long period of nineteen years. The new or convention parliament, composed of both lords and commons, met on the 25th of April; and having received favourable communications from Charles II. at Breda, they invited him to return and resume the crown as his hereditary right. But they committed a fatal error, which required another revolution to rectify, in recalling the King, and reinvesting him with power, before due stipulations had been made for the constitutional exercise of the royal prerogative. "Never had so fair an opportunity been offered of establishing a compact between the sovereign and the people, of determining by mutual consent the legal rights of the crown, and securing from future encroachment the freedom of the people. But the King ascended the throne unfettered with conditions, and thence inferred that he was entitled to all the powers claimed by his father at the commencement of the civil war. In a few years the consequence became manifest. It was found that by the negligence or perfidy of Monk a door had been left open to the recurrence of dissension between the crown and the people; and that very circumstance which Charles had hailed as the consummation of his good fortune, served only to prepare the way for a second revolution, which ended in the permanent exclusion of his family from the government of these kingdoms."<sup>58</sup>

THE progress of events in Ireland kept pace with the rapid changes which occurred in the sister kingdom. Sir Charles Coote, with whom the reader is already familiar as the implacable persecutor of the Presbyterians and Prelatists, and other friends of monarchy, now abandoned his former associates, and placed himself at the head of the royalists.<sup>1</sup> Supported by Lord Broghill, who had also complied with the usurper, and held office under Cromwell, he opened a secret correspondence with Charles II., and with Monck;<sup>2</sup> but Sir Hardress Waller, another of the commissioners for Ireland, and a staunch republican, suspecting the design of recalling the King, seized the castle of Dublin for the parliament. After a siege of five days, however, he was obliged to surrender to Coote; and the royalist party, supported by the Presbyterians, became masters of the kingdom. The government was now conducted by a council of officers, who used every precaution in their power, by remodelling the army and placing confidential persons in the command of the principal garrisons, to preserve the peace of the country, and secure in due time the restoration of the exiled sovereign.

The Presbyterians of Ulster not only cordially acquiesced in these changes—they promoted and encouraged them to the utmost of their power. Adair, who was a principal actor in the scenes which he describes, furnishes the following faithful narrative of events at this momentous crisis, containing important information relative to Irish affairs, now for the first time presented to the public :—

“In Ireland, though the Presbyterians had not men of note and quality to be leaders in these affairs, yet their prayers were not wanting for the King’s happy restoration; and in this juncture of affairs the ministers did encourage the people that in their station they would be ready and assisting in their duty. The true Presbyterians indeed were heartily acting and concurring in all these passages in order to the King’s restoration, and with a view to a happy settling of religion, according to the first undertaking in Scotland. Others, pretending the party. But no sooner did the prospect of a revolution in favour of the banished family begin to open, than he was among the first of the deserters, and employed the power he had in Ireland to the double advantage of wiping off old scores with the new government by a zealous attention to the purposes of their revenge, and to the enlarging of his ill-gotten possessions with the plunder of his old friends.”—Vol. i. p. 105.

same end, at that time concurred with them, and no doubt would have so continued, if the King had stood to his solemn engagements and countenanced religion accordingly. Particularly the Lord Broghill, and Sir Charles Coote, then president of Connaught, and with his brethren and friends commanding a good part of the army, were special actors in the affairs of Ireland at this time. They, with other persons of quality and interest in the nation, resolved to call a GENERAL CONVENTION from the several parts of the kingdom, chosen after the manner of members elected for parliament; a regular parliament being impossible in this juncture in Ireland, as it was in England—her parliament, being the same which had, long before that, been legally chosen and confirmed by Charles I. to sit during pleasure, and they having been only interrupted for a time through the prevailing of the sectarian party, did only then reassume its own power. But Ireland's parliament had been legally dissolved. Therefore, to supply this defect, it was agreed there should be such a convention called; which was accordingly chosen in the several counties of Protestants. They met in Dublin about the beginning of February, 1660,<sup>3</sup> where it was consulted how to settle and order affairs in the nation as the present circumstances of the times would permit, and particularly the army, which before this had been wholly under the command of the prevailing party and opposite to the King and a free parliament. This convention consisted of persons of divers principles, though most part prelatical and such as always had adhered to the King against the parliament of England. Yet a few were otherwise principled, and intended the Solemn League and Covenant; and all at first seemed to favour Presbyterians, even the enemies of that way now apprehending that possibly the King would own that side.

<sup>3</sup> Carte (ii., 202) says the convention met on the 7th of February. Sir James Barry, afterwards Lord Santry, was chosen chairman. Of him see Lodge, i., 307.

“Yet a due testimony is not to be denied Henry Cromwell, though the son of the usurper Oliver; who, when he perceived matters to go to confusion in England after his father’s death, and the Anabaptists carry all along both in England and Ireland, he had a desire and resolution to be instrumental for bringing home the King to his just right, though upon terms by which religion and property might be secured. This he did communicate to the soberest of the officers of the army, who he thought would be most ready to concur; and particularly to the lord-president [Coote] and to the Lord Broghill.<sup>4</sup> But the motion from him was crushed by those whom he looked on as his friends and the King’s friends; and some of them, seeing things go as they did, resolved to take the glory of the King’s restoration to themselves. Upon this, Sir Arthur Forbes, a gallant gentleman, who had been a great sufferer for the King, both in his blood and estate, was sent over to the King, then at Breda, with a tender of their service to his majesty, and intimation how far Ireland was at his disposal, without any terms or conditions for religion. Yea, these two lords in Dublin growing emulous of one another, and both being afraid of the King’s displeasure on his return, having been great compliers with the times before, they studied to ingratiate themselves with the King, and resolved to prevent [anticipate] one another by offering the King, though then abroad, all conditions on his return that he could require. This they thought would be acceptable to the King, the rather because it was expected that England would not receive him without conditions, somewhat equivalent to those upon which he was first received in Scotland; for the Long Parliament then sitting in England owned the Covenant and work of reformation. But that truly worthy person, Sir

<sup>4</sup> This confirms what had been suspected by other historians, and only obscurely hinted at by contemporary correspondents. See Hallam, ii., 135, where, however, the authority from Thurloe is erroneously quoted; the reference ought to have been to the seventh, not to the sixth, volume of that work.

John Clotworthy, being then in Dublin, a member of the convention, and finding out these designs of the lords, so wrought with them that they concurred to send one from them both to the King, with conditions for Ireland as well as for England on his restoration. And they both pitched upon Sir John to go on this negotiation. He accordingly went as far as London in his way to Holland; but Monk's actings prevented his further journey.

“But to return to the CONVENTION of Ireland at this time sitting in Dublin; I shall not, however, touch any of their actings save wherein religion may be concerned. First, they chose for their chaplain a man reputed the soundest Presbyterian at that time in Dublin, one Mr. Cox,<sup>5</sup> calling him to theirs prayers every morning when they began their business. Immediately they called eight ministers, two from each province in Ireland, all reputed learned and sober and prudent men, that they might give their advice to the convention in order to settling the Church in Ireland for that time, both in approving fit ministers and ordering colleges and schools, till a parliament thereafter be duly called. Next, the convention appointed a general fast through Ireland, and with the proclamation for keeping the fast were inserted the causes thereof, among which breach of Covenant was one. This fast was kept universally where orthodox ministers were settled: and very solemnly in Christ Church in Dublin, where the whole members of the convention were present, and in which was kept somewhat of the order used in these times even by sober persons; viz.—one minister to pray first and preach, and another to pray after sermon a considerable length; in which prayer the whole state of the times was mentioned, and both confessions and petitions were at length insisted on; and these four ministers carried on the work of the day.

“Those ministers that were called to the convention did all appear in Dublin a little after, and had their commission given them, and were ordered to consult among themselves anent what overtures might tend to the good of the Church in the meantime, and then acquaint a committee[of the convention] appointed to consider matters of religion, with their overtures; and withal to give their advice to that committee anent such offers as they should be asked of by it. There was only called from the north, Mr. Patrick Adair, by an order of the convention sent him: Upon which he acquainted the brethren and desired a meeting of them at Belfast from both counties, where they gave him instructions how to carry himself—mainly to endeavour the promoting the work of reformation, and to set on foot overtures for that end in the present juncture when there seemed to be opportunity; and also to guard against episcopal courses on the one hand, and sectarian on the other. He was obliged to acquaint the brethren in the north with what passages were necessary to be communicated to them. This he accordingly did during his abode there; and agreeably to his instructions endeavoured, with the rest of the ministers, that they should propose to the convention the recommending of the Covenant and the owning of it, and thereafter the renewing of it. Unto this most of them consented. But there being one, Mr. Vesey, of Coleraine, highly prelati- cal in his heart and not sound in his principles, which was not so well known to the rest; he did from time to time make some of the high prelati- cal faction in the convention acquainted with this private consultation about promoting the Covenant. And they, consulting among themselves how to obviate its being publicly proposed, resolved that the chairman, Sir James Barry, should openly declare against such proceedings of the ministers. As indeed he did openly declare, if that Covenant came in before the convention to be taken into consideration, and any votings passed about it, he would leave the chair and protest against it. Whereupon the rest of his party did applaud him; and those of the convention who favoured it were of the fewest number, others were indifferent, and so that design was crushed in the bud.

“However, these ministers had power to recommend all honest able men to the convention, that such only should be capable of maintenance; and were charged to recommend none who were of Anabaptistical principles, who refused ordination by orthodox ministers, or who were scandalous in their life. Accordingly they drew up a list of the ministers then in Ireland who were judged sober, orthodox men, to the number of near an hundred; besides those belonging to the Presbytery in the north, upwards of sixty;—all whom were allowed of the convention to receive a legal right to the tithe of the parishes where they severally were; and, in order to that, they were to receive induction into the churches by such neighbouring ministers as were appointed for that effect. And withal they inquired after and gave in a list of those now enjoying salary who were Anabaptists, whereof there was a large number in considerable salaries in Ireland, and divers of them members of the army, and some who refused ordination. These were degraded from their preaching and deprived of their salaries, who a little before had ruled all. Besides, these ministers gave in their advice anent the more comfortable settling of ministers in their maintenance; in which most of them would needs have some helps added to the ministers’ maintenance; against which Mr. Adair was necessitated to enter his dissent from the rest.

“Thereupon, besides the convention, another judicatory more seemingly legal (as that time could bear) sat in Dublin constituted of three men who were commissioners from a council of state in England a little before this; and had power and injunctions from the said council to endeavour the propagation of the Gospel in Ireland in opposition to atheism, idolatry, Popery, superstition and prophaneness; but they had no commission then to suppress heresy. These commissioners were Broghill, Coote, and Sir William Bury, a religious prudent gentleman. These, having some kind of authority from England, did for the time act as they saw the time permitting; and though they sat in the convention and were chief instruments for gathering it; yet they ordinarily sat and acted for themselves. And it was by their authority properly that ministers were settled and had maintenance; and this authority they owned as derived from the council of state which had been appointed by authority of a parliament in England a little before this.

“ It was related before, that when things were in doubt and suspense before the King’s return, the convention seemed to favour the Covenant and the Presbyterian party; and matters seemed to be in a hopeful course. But, as our grandees had intelligence of the pulse of the court at Breda, they altered their course. Then they began to court the few old bishops that were in Ireland, who then had repaired to Dublin. They allowed them considerable salaries in the meantime, and began to give them their titles. I was then at most three months in Dublin. Some bishops, who at my arrival there had very hardly access to the commissioners upon any business, and not one seeming to own them in the streets, and who had been content with the countenance of any private person; before I left the place they had become high and much courted, and their titles given them. All things then turned just as the King’s inclination was observed to be. Thus when those eight ministers, already mentioned, had denied recommendation to divers old prelati- cal men who were corrupt in their doctrine, and immoral in their lives, and were generally known to be unworthy all place in the Church of God; now at the present time, the committee of religion appointed by the convention did begin to plead for them, and said, that if the eight ministers.

would not give such men their recommendation, they themselves would recommend them to the commissioners for parishes and tithes. Yea, the greatest number of the eight ministers were drawn to be lax in these things, and would give recommendations to men, with whom the fewest number could not join. But a little after the King's restoration there was no more use for these ministers. Therefore they were dismissed [in the beginning of May], and the convention sent commissioners to England to the King, desiring the restoring of the former laws and church-government and worship."

In the meantime, Charles II. had been formally proclaimed sovereign of the three kingdoms—in London on the 8th, and in Dublin on the 14th of May. On the 28th of the same month, the convention adjourned, having commissioned Sir John Clotworthy, with several others, to attend the English Parliament, and Coote and Broghill to wait upon the King;<sup>6</sup> and on the following day, the anniversary of his birth, Charles the Second entered London in state, and ascended the throne amid the most extravagant demonstrations of joy. It was not long before his determination to replace the Church on its former basis was, notwithstanding his solemn oaths and his recent declaration, clearly indicated. Meanwhile, however, the policy of the court was to amuse the Presbyterians, whom it was yet dangerous to offend, and to gain time until their union and power were broken, and the prelatical party firmly seated in office. "They were therefore flattered with hopes till their strength and influence were gradually diminished; till the bees had lost their stings, and were become noisy but impotent drones."<sup>7</sup> The leading Presbyterians seemed to be wholly unfitted for the exigencies of their situation. They were pliable and servile, at a time when the utmost firmness and decision were indispensable, and permitted themselves to be cajoled and lulled into security, when men of the least sagacity and penetration might have discerned the hostile designs of the court. Accordingly, after a brief interval of hollow favour to the Presbyterian clergy of the metropolis, and an insincere attempt, at the Savoy conference, to meet their scruples and comprehend them within the establishment, Charles threw off the mask, restored Prelacy and the liturgy, denounced the Covenant and its adherents, and refused toleration to Nonconformists, in direct and undisguised violation of his oft-repeated declarations and his most solemn oaths.

The effects of this change of policy in the court were in due time felt in Ireland. The Presbyterians of Ulster, in common with their brethren in the sister kingdoms, were at first deluded by the hope of enjoying the favour and confidence of Charles, on account both of their firm and unwavering attachment to his cause under the usurpation, and of his own engagements in behalf of their parent Church in Scotland. Immediately after the convention had adjourned, when all parties—the army, the adventurers, the Prelatists, and even the Romanists—were hurrying over to secure the favour of the court, the Presbyterians likewise determined to send a deputation to the King to explain their state and solicit protection. “After Mr. Adair’s return home from Dublin there was held a synod at Ballymena, where all the brethren in the north were present. He gave them an account of his keeping their instructions and the state of the times as he could. He also brought every one of them a warrant for the tithes of their respective parishes, so far as was in the power of the commissioners in Dublin. This however lasted but for that year and the next, till the bishops were established.

“The brethren, considering what might be their duty at this juncture, resolved to send two of their number to the King with an address. In this address they humbly minded his majesty of God’s wonderful dealing with him in his preservation and restoration, on which they heartily congratulated him. But withal they humbly petitioned the settling of religion according to the rule of reformation against Popery, Prelacy, heresy, &c., according to the Covenant. With this address, subscribed by all their hands, they sent Mr. William Keyes, an Englishman lately settled among them, and principally sent because he was an Englishman, and Mr. William Richardson. These brethren began their journey in [the end of] May, 1660, and went to England. But the nearer they came to the court they had intelligence of less ground of hope of any success to their desires. When they came to London, they applied themselves first to Sir John Clotworthy, their acquaintance and true friend.<sup>8</sup> He went along with them to the special ministers of the city of their own persuasion, such as Mr. Calamy, Mr. Ash, Doctor Manton, &c., who, when they saw the address, told the brethren they thought the plainness of it for the Covenant and against prelates would make it unacceptable to the court. However they applied to others, who they thought might prove their friends, and obtain access to the King, such as Lord Manchester, Mr. Annesley, &c., and Sir John went along with them. These promised what assistance they could; but at the same time told the brethren that the mentioning the Covenant and against Prelacy in the address would give offence to the King. For by this time the King had not only declared for Prelacy and disowned the Covenant, but had named bishops for all the dioceses in Ireland, who were making ready to go to their bishopricks. They also went, not without difficulty of access, to Monk, now Duke of Albemarle, and general of all the army, being accompanied to him with the Lord Broghill, Mr. Annesley, and Sir John Clotworthy. But he disgusted their address and would not concern himself in it, as it was drawn up; but told them if they would petition his majesty he would assist them.<sup>9</sup>

<sup>8</sup> The notorious James Sharp, afterwards archbishop of St. Andrews, in a letter from London, on the 7th of July, 1660, says to his correspondent, the Rev. R. Douglass, in Scotland—"Sir John Clotworthy told me that he expected this night three ministers from Ireland, Messrs. Hart, Richardson, and Kaies [Keyes.] Their coming is very ill relished by the commissioners from the convention who are here, who have petitioned that Episcopacy be settled there; and accordingly the most are nominated by the King; Bramhall, primate of Armagh, Dr. Taylor, bishop of Down, &c."—Stephens' "Life and Times of Archbishop Sharp," p. 65.

“The honest brethren were thus put to great straits what to do; having instructions from their brethren to offer nothing else but that address, and all their friends on the other hand telling them it would not be acceptable; neither would the great persons, who otherwise owned them, procure them access to his majesty, except they would alter some expressions in it. They were therefore at last prevailed with to expunge the mentioning the Covenant and Prelacy. On this they were introduced to the King by Mr. Annesley, then a professed friend to Presbyterians; though thereafter being made Earl of Anglesey, and advanced to high places of profit and honour about court, he disowned Presbyterian principles, and in other things proved not so sound as was expected. When the brethren had access to his majesty, he was pleased to hear the address, as then framed, read by Mr. Annesley. He looked with an awful majestical countenance on them; yet he gave them good words, owning the ministers of Ireland’s loyalty in the time of the usurpers, and promising his royal protection for the time to come. He bid them not fear, for he had appointed a deputy for Ireland who would prove their friend (this was the Lord Robarts, though another was appointed afterwards); and concluded by promising to give Lord Robarts his commands concerning them.

“The brethren upon this returned home. At their arrival,

<sup>9</sup> Another extract from the correspondence of Sharp at this period, dated the 26th of July, corroborates Adair:—“The brethren from Ireland are at a great stand what to do; the general, Manchester, or any person of interest, refuse to introduce them to the King, if they present their address; they have written to the brethren, who sent them how they find matters stated. By what I can learn, the most they can expect will be a forbearance for a time in the exercise of their ministry; but it will not be permitted them to meet in presbyteries or a synod.”—Stephens, ubi supra, pp. 74, 75.

there was a meeting appointed at Ballymena [in September], where they were joyfully received by the rest. They owned the providence of God toward them in giving them access to the King ; as other addresses, sent from the ministers of their persuasion in other parts of Ireland by a very grave, learned, and bold man, could have no access, but he was obliged to return home without doing anything. And they were thanked by the rest for their diligence. Yet the brethren did signify their dislike of that alteration of the address :—that being more displeasing to them than all they had done was pleasing. They saw a change and overturning drawing near. The bishops would take no notice of words spoken in private by the King ; and they were grieved that the testimony they had given against that sad defection and for the Covenant should have been smothered, and yet they nothing the better dealt with. This did a little after appear. For the bishops hasted over to take possession of their dioceses, and were assisted therein by those who ruled for the time in Ireland ; and immediately they set up their public liturgies, altars, bishops' courts, &c."<sup>10</sup>

A dark cloud, charged with the elements of a portentous storm, was rapidly gathering around the Presbyterians of Ulster. In every direction signs were multiplying, which too clearly indicated the approach of a season of suffering and persecution. The Church had now for seven years enjoyed an interval of considerable prosperity ; and her ministers, with exemplary diligence, had faithfully improved the favourable opportunities afforded for promoting and consolidating her interests. It was during this period that Presbyterianism struck its roots so deeply and extensively throughout the province as to enable it to endure in safety the subsequent storms of persecution, and to stand erect and flourishing, while all the other temporary scions of dissent were broken down and prostrated in the dust. In the year 1653, the Church possessed scarcely more than the half-dozen of ministers who had ventured to remain in the country; now, however, she was served by not less than SEVENTY ministers regularly and permanently settled, and having under their charge nearly EIGHTY parishes or congregations, comprising a population of probably not far from ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND souls.<sup>11</sup> These ministers were associated in five presbyteries, which held monthly meetings and annual visitations of all the churches within their bounds, and which were subordinate to a General Presbytery or Synod that ordinarily met four times in each year. In the several departments of government, discipline, worship, and doctrine, an entire conformity with the parent Church of Scotland was strictly maintained. No candidate for the ministry was received into communion or ordained until the Presbytery had received ample proofs of his literary attainments, religious character, and theological views, by means of public and private trials, which often extended through six or eight months. Prior to ordination, he was required to take the Solemn League and Covenant, by which he was bound to oppose Popery, Prelacy, superstition, and heresy, and to approve and accept of the Westminster Confession of Faith,* Catechisms, and Directory, received by the parent Church in Scotland as parts of the covenanted uniformity which that bond was designed to promote; he was also required, as previously noticed, to subscribe the Act of Bangor, and to study peace and subjection to his brethren in the Lord. Ministers were settled solely upon the call of their respective parishes, and legal bonds for their maintenance out of the tithe were perfected by the principal landed proprietors ; yet so difficult was it found, even with the aid of this precautionary measure, to secure a due support, that, had it not been for the endowments assigned to some of them out of the treasury, many congregations must have remained destitute of a resident ministry. Great strictness was observed by sessions and presbyteries in censuring disorderly and immoral persons ; ministerial visitations from house to house were punctually maintained ; and the most commendable diligence was employed in communicating catechetical instruction to all classes, but especially to the young. Thus was laid the foundation of that solid acquaintance with the doctrines of the Gospel, as exhibited in the Westminster Confession of Faith and Catechisms, which preserved the Church in unity and vigour amid the distracting sects and heresies of the Protectorate, and the subsequent snares and persecutions of the Prelacy.

<sup>11</sup> In Note 33 of the preceding chapter, the reader has seen that, in the year 1656, an enemy of the Presbyterians, not disposed to overrate the strength of his foes, calculated that the Scots in Ulster could raise at any time 40,000 fighting men. There is little doubt, therefore, that after four years more of continued prosperity and undisturbed repose, the whole amount of the Presbyterian population must have exceeded, rather than fallen short of, the amount stated in the text.

[* The attachment of the fathers of the Irish Presbyterian Church to the doctrines of the Westminster Confession cannot be disputed. Livingston, of Killinchy, when banished from Scotland after the Restoration, wrote a farewell letter to his parishioners, in which he says—"I recommend to you, above all books, except the blessed Word of God, the Confession of Faith, and Larger Catechism."—The Hamilton Manuscripts, by T. K. Lowry, Esq., LL.D., p. 40, note.]

These persecutions soon approached. So early as the first week in August, not ten weeks after his arrival in London, the King nominated persons to fill the vacant sees in Ireland. In Ulster, only the primacy,<sup>12</sup> and the bishopric of Dromore

<sup>12</sup> Primate Ussher resided constantly in England from the year 1640, and was latterly supported by a pension from Cromwell. He died at Kyegate, in Surrey, not far from London, on the 21st of March, 1656, in the seventy-seventh year of his age. Cromwell honoured him with a splendid public funeral, and he was buried in great state on the 17th of April, in St. Paul's Chapel in Westminster Abbey, in the grave next to that of Sir James Fullerton, who had been his master, and afterwards his tutor, in Trinity College, Dublin. (Parr., p. 79.) Yet, in Dart's "History of Westminster Abbey" (folio, London, 1723, ii. 142), it is stated his grave is not known. Ussher left his library to his only child, Lady Tyrrell, to whom both the King of Denmark and Cardinal Mazarine, prime minister of Louis XIV., made proposals for its purchase. But the officers and soldiers of the Irish army under Henry Cromwell, highly to their credit, bought it for the sum of £2000, which they raised among themselves by subscription, intending to make it the foundation of a library for the new college proposed to be founded in Dublin. The subsequent revolutions in the government frustrated the

were vacant by the deaths of their incumbents. Bramhall of Derry, Jones of Clogher,* John Leslie of Raphoe, and Henry Leslie of Down and Connor, still survived, and returned to their respective dioceses. Of these prelates, Bramhall, the inveterate and now exasperated opponent of the Presbyterians, was elevated to the primacy, and a Doctor Wild appointed to succeed him in Derry. Henry Leslie was removed to Meath, and the celebrated Jeremy Taylor was nominated as his successor in Down and Connor; and Robert Leslie, the eldest son of Henry, was selected to fill the vacant see of Dromore.

Encouraged by the restoration of Prelacy, the gentry, especially those who had renounced their allegiance to Charles, and held office under the usurpers, hastened to join once more the ascendant party, and to place their new-born loyalty beyond suspicion by studiously inciting the State against the ill-fated Presbyterians. Among these were not only Lord Broghill and Sir Charles Coote, as already noticed, but also Lord Blaney, Lord Caulfield, Sir William Cole, Sir George Rawdon, design; and the Irish House of Commons, on the 31st of May, 1661 (Journals, i., 627), directed the books and MSS. to be taken from the castle, where they had been kept since their removal to Ireland, and deposited in Trinity College, "there to be preserved for public use," where they still form one of the most valuable portions of that most valuable library.

[* "The history of Henry Jones is remarkable. He was nephew to Archbishop Ussher. Through the interest of the Marquis of Ormonde, he was made bishop of Clogher, in 1645; but, as it soon afterwards became apparent that the Church was not the way to promotion, Jones turned republican and joined the Regicides. We find him pressing the engagement; and, during the Protectorate, he was appointed one of the trustees for the Schools of Erasmus Smith. The Protector saw that he possessed ability and energy, and furnished him with employment. The bishop accordingly laid aside his clerical character, arrayed himself in regimentals, and became scout-master-general in Cromwell's army. (Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormonde, ii. 498.) He is reported to have been an intrepid soldier, and to have signalised himself by his bloody achievements. (Nelson's Collections, ii., 535.) On the death of Cromwell he anticipated coming changes—again turned royalist, and exerted himself in promoting the Restoration. He was, in consequence, permitted to retain the see of Clogher, and was subsequently made bishop of Meath; but in 1661, when a fresh batch of Irish prelates was consecrated in Dublin, Jones was not permitted to join in the imposition of hands, (Harris' Ware's Bishops of Meath)."—Note to Adair's Narrative, p. 196. It was not considered seemly that the old Cromwellian scout-master-general should be employed in the consecration of the new hierarchy.]

Colonel Trevor, Colonel Arthur Hill, and many others. These mercenary time-servers were now the most forward to denounce, as disloyal and unworthy of toleration, those very ministers whom they had shortly before persecuted for steadfast loyalty and attachment to monarchy, at a time when they themselves were the traitorous supporters of Cromwell's usurpation! Thus Lord Caulfield, writing from Charlemont, in the end of October, a congratulatory letter to Bramhall, who had recently arrived at Armagh, boasts in the following terms of his zeal in punishing the neighbouring ministers and preventing their presbyterial meetings:—"In these unhappy northern quarters—those whom we esteem most dangerous are the Presbyterian factions who do not like [mislike?] publickly to preach up the authority of their kirk to be above that of the crown and our dread sovereign. I have myself discoursed with divers of their ministers both in publick and private, who have maintained that the kirk hath power to excommunicate their kings; and when the oaths of allegiance and supremacy were administered here, one of them told me that we had pulled down one pope and set up another. But I made bold to inflict such punishments as I thought were proper for their offences, and hindered their meetings where I have considered there might be anything consulted of tending to the breach of the peace either in Church or commonwealth."<sup>13</sup>

The Lord Robarts, to whom reference has already been made, was selected by Charles to be lord-deputy of Ireland; but his haughty temper being intolerable to the Irish nobility and chief officers of state then in England, his patent was soon after recalled, and it was deemed expedient to commit the government for a time to the three lords-justices. Accordingly, on the last day of December, Sir Charles Coote, who had been recently created Earl of Montrath, and Sir Maurice Eustace, the lord-chancellor, and shortly after Lord Broghill, now Earl of Orrery, were sworn into that office. The civil government being thus legally restored, the next step was to complete the edifice of the Church. On the twenty-seventh of January, 1661, two archbishops and ten bishops were, in prelatical phraseology, consecrated in St. Patrick's cathedral, Dublin, with all due pomp and formality.<sup>14</sup> One of the first acts of the lords-justices was to order an extraordinary fast to be held on the 30th of January, the anniversary of the execution of the late king; and at the instigation of the bishops, they issued a proclamation forbidding all unlawful assemblies, under which meetings of presbytery were included, and directing the sheriffs and other officers to prevent or disperse them,

The first meeting on which this order took effect was held at Ballymena in the month of March. "In the mean time," writes Adair, "when the bishops were making ready for their work—of crushing all faithful ministers and extinguishing Presbyterian government—and previous to their visitations, the brethren, though by proclamation discharged from any presbyterial meetings, yet met first in a synod at Ballymena to consult and take a common course anent their carriage. This being known to some governors in the country, especially Sir George Rawdon, who had also been their opposer before as the times were, there was a party of horse sent by him

"Angels look down and joy to see,
Like that above, a monarchy!
Angels look down and joy to see,
Like that above, a hierarchy!"

See "Secret History of the Court of Charles II., i., 281. [Dr. Mant observes that "the consecration, at the same time, and by imposition of the same hands, of twelve Christian bishops, two of the number being of metropolitan eminence, to their apostolical superintendence of the Church of Christ, is an event probably without a parallel in the Church." "History of Church of Ireland, i., 611.) In more ancient times such an event could not have occurred, as it would have involved an outrageous violation of the canons of the Church. A bishop was then elected by the people, and ordained in the church in which he was afterwards stately to preach.]

to scatter the brethren ; but Providence so ordered it that they were dissolved before the troopers came. Here they met in a more private way than usually, and sent four of their number from their several presbyteries to Dublin to put the justices in mind of the King's gracious-like promises to their brethren at London upon delivery of their address. They sent one of these brethren along, as one of the four, to bear witness of that circumstance. They accordingly went to Dublin, and gave in a petition to the justices in their own and brethren's names to be free of the yoke of prelacy, &c., and founding their petition on the King's gracious answer to their brethren at London. Beside, Sir John Clotworthy, now Lord Massareene, their great and constant friend, being then at court, had promise from the King that the declaration about religion emitted at that time should have some addition put to it favourable for the Presbyterians in Ireland. Upon this they were called before the council table, and in discourse with the chancellor, the preses, they had opportunity to declare what had been their carriage, loyalty, and sufferings upon that account in time of the usurper ; and withal their present principles of loyalty to his majesty, and resolutions to give obedience to the laws, if not active yet to endure the penalties ; and that they resolved always to live as peaceable, loyal, and dutiful subjects. They were but unkindly entertained by the council, divers bishops being then privy-councillors, besides other unfriends. They were reviled and mocked by the episcopal party in Dublin ; however the substance of their desires was not granted."

Of this fruitless interview between the ministers and the privy-council, one of the lords-justices has given a more enlarged account, which demands insertion, as illustrating the views of the government and corroborating the narrative of Adair. "We have had," writes the Earl of Orrery to Ormond, then in England, "these two days four ministers before us, which were sent from the several presbyteries in Ulster to the lords-justices and council, desiring liberty to exercise their ministry in their respective parishes, according to the way they have hitherto exercised it in; and expressing their great sorrow to find themselves numbered with Papists and fanatics in our late proclamation which prohibited unlawful assemblies. After many debates upon several proposals how to answer them, we resolved on this answer: That we neither could or would allow any discipline to be exercised in church affairs, but what was warranted and commanded by the laws of the land. That they were punishable for having exercised any other. That we would not take any advantage against them for what was past, if they would comport themselves conformably for the time to come. That if they were dispensed withal, by pleading a submission thereunto was against their consciences, Papists and fanatics would expect the like indulgence from the like plea, which we knew their own practice as well as judgments led them to disallow of. That we took it very ill, divers of those which had sent them, had not observed the time set apart for humbling themselves for the barbarous murder of his late majesty, a sin which no honest man could avoid being sorry for. That some of their number had preached seditiously in crying up the Covenant, the seeds of all our miseries, in lamenting his majesty's breach of it as setting up Episcopacy as introductive to Popery; which they had not punished in exercising any of their pretended discipline over such notorious offenders. And lastly, that if they conformed themselves to the discipline of this Church, they should want no fitting countenance and encouragement in carrying on their ministry; so, if they continued refractory, they must expect the penalties the law did prescribe. To all which they answered, that as far as their consciences would permit them they would comply, and what it would not they would patiently suffer. That it was their religion to obey a lawful authority, and such they owned his majesty was, either actively or passively. That, if any of their judgment had preached sedition, they left them to themselves and disowned them; and if they had the exercising of their discipline they would punish severely all such. That many of them had, according to the proclamation, kept the fast for the King's murder, which they heartily detested, and for the doing thereof in the usurper's government many of them had been imprisoned and sequestered; and that to the last of their lives they would continue loyal to his majesty. And lest they might offend against our proclamation, they desired to know what was meant by unlawful assemblies, because some were so severe as to interpret their meetings to pray and preach on the Lord's-day to come under that head. To which we told them that by unlawful meetings was only meant such assemblies as were to exercise any ecclesiastical jurisdictions which were not warranted by the laws of the kingdom, and not to hinder their meetings in performing parochial duties in those benefices of which they were possessed legally or illegally. They seemed much comforted with the last assurance; so that having again exhorted them to conformity, and promised them therein all encouragement, we dismissed them to try what this usage and the admonition will produce."<sup>15</sup>

Adair thus continues his narrative of the interesting events which issued in the deposition of himself and his brethren :—

“From the answer of the justices and council may be seen what small encouragement the ministers had, and no obstacle put in the bishops' way to follow their designs. They indeed went on in their several dioceses against any minister of that sort much according to the genius of the bishop himself; some more slowly and with greater commiseration and humanity, others with greater severity, especially where the throng of such ministers principally were, as in the dioceses of Down, Connor, and Derry.

“The bishop of Down [Jeremy Taylor,] coming to his diocese at the time when the brethren were in Dublin, had intelligence of them and their errand ; and so had an envious eye upon them. However, he forbore his first visitation till they returned ; and finding they had obtained no encouragement, he immediately summoned them all to his visitation. They could not then have a general meeting to consult ; but Providence so ordered it that, a few days before the summons came which they were expecting, most of them were called to the burial of an honourable and truly religious lady, the Lady Clotworthy, the mother of the now Lord Massareene. There they had occasion to advise together, and were not all of one mind as to their going to Lisnegarvy. However most part met in Belfast a day before the visitation, and from thence went together to Lisnegarvy. The bishop being then at his house in Hillsborough, the brethren sent three of their number to the bishop the day before the appointed visitation. Their errand was to tell him that whereas they had received summonses to appear before his visitation, they could not appear in answer to that summons, neither as submitting themselves to episcopal jurisdiction, nor at all in the public visitation. Yet they were willing to confer with him in private, that he might know they were men that walked by principle, and held not groundless opinions ; and that though they were dissenters from the present church-government and modes of worship, yet they were the King’s true subjects. He desired they would give in on paper what they had to say. This they declined, on consideration that many of their brethren were not present. He told them he would receive nothing from them as a body, nor look on them in that light. They told him, whatever they were or whatever way he looked on them, they behoved to advise with one another in matters of that concernment; as their relation as ministers, their former correspondence in all such matters, and their Christian prudence, called for. Seeing they would give him no paper, he questioned them whether they held Presbyterian government to be 'jure divino,' and desired they would give a positive answer. They readily answered they did. To this the bishop replied, that there needed no farther discourse of the matter of accommodation if they held to that. They said it was a truth whereof they were persuaded in their conscience, and could not relinquish it, but must profess it as they were called; therefore, if answers of that nature would but irritate at the public visitation, they judged it better not to appear, but to confer with him freely in private. He answered, if they should make profession contrary to law in the visitation, they would smart for it. Therefore, seeing our foot in a snare, he desired them rather not to appear, and that as their friend. They thanked him, and withal said, they conceived they might hold presbyterian government to be 'jure divino,' and yet not transgress the law of the land, since they were not exercising that government, for they knew that affirmative precepts bound not 'ad semper.' He answered that was true, yet that they were not subject to another government was contrary to law; and he said, though the King's late declaration in matters of religion were extended to Ireland, it would do them no good. They returned that there were many in England who held presbyterian government to be 'jure divino,' yet at present enjoyed the benefit of the King's declaration. He replied, he saw not how that could consist.

"He then questioned them if they could take the oath of supremacy. They answered they could not absolutely say what their brethren could do, since it was never put to them; but they judged, if that oath were moulded in the sense in which Bishop Ussher explained it, and wherein King James acquiesced, none of the brethren would refuse it. He said, that being informed by a good hand, before some of their number went to Dublin, that they intended to petition the council for it with that explication (wherein the reader may know how groundless his information was), he did then inquire whether it was conformable to law to give it with that explication, and it was answered to him it could not. Therefore he would tender it to them in the grammatical sense, and said he knew none to scruple that oath but Jesuits and Presbyterians, who were the greatest enemies to monarchy and most disobedient to kings; which he instanced in the way of the Assembly of Scotland, and in Calvin, Knox, Buchanan, &c. He said, moreover, that where Presbyterians differed from Papists in some smaller things, they agreed in this great thing. However, neither this bishop nor any of the rest did urge this oath upon ministers, knowing the law did not allow them to urge it on any who bore not some office in Church or commonwealth; and they did not look on these ministers as capable of ecclesiastical offices, not owning their ordination, much less to be in any office under the King. He said also he perceived they were in a hard taking; for if they did conform contrary to their conscience, they would be but knaves, and if not, they could not be endured contrary to law: he wished them therefore 'deponere conscientiam erroneam.' The brethren, being somewhat troubled at that so odious comparison between them and Jesuits, and at his reflecting on the Assembly of Scotland and the worthy reformers, shewed him his mistake in such a way as their circumstances could admit. On this they returned to their brethren at Lisnegarvy, where, after giving account of their discourse with the bishop, the brethren saw themselves in a hard taking, yet encouraged one another to fidelity and steadfastness.

"The next day was the bishop's visitation in Lisnegarvy, where he himself preached; but none of the brethren except two went to hear him. Thereafter in his visitation all were called and none appeared; yet he did nothing farther that day. After dinner, two of the former four and another brother were sent to him to see if he would call all the brethren together to his chamber to confer with him, which they apprehended he had proposed at Hillsborough; especially from his saying it was not fit for them to appear in public. When accordingly they went and proposed this to him, he wholly waived to answer their question, and fell angrily on reflections on presbyterial government, having nothing to reflect on any particular brother, or on the particular actings of the Presbytery in this country, though fain he would if he could; and withal proposing arguments for conformity, which engaged the brethren in some discourse of that nature. Notwithstanding his own expressions the day before respecting their not appearing at the visitation, yet he now alleged it was contempt made the brethren not to appear on that occasion. One said it was the awe of God and conscience that made them not appear. He replied a Jew or a Quaker would say so much for their opinions, and every body would use that argument for the vindication of their erroneous courses. There were also some few of the brethren whom he called to him in private to engage them to conformity, and gave them great offers of kindness and preferment; but he obtained not his purpose.

“The brethren repaired to their respective congregations with expectation of the coming storm. For this bishop did in one day in his visitation declare thirty-six churches vacant.<sup>16</sup> He did not make any process against the ministers, nor suspend nor excommunicate. But he simply held them not for ministers, they not being ordained by bishops. Therefore, he only declared the parishes vacant which he was to supply, himself having immediately the charge of all the souls in his diocese as he professed; and procured priests and curates for these parishes as he thought fit. The rest of the brethren in other dioceses were dealt with in the same manner in the end, though not with so great haste and violence.

“After this sentence declaring the churches vacant, the ministers continued preaching for a while till it became physically impossible for them to continue; curates being sent to some places and taking possession of the churches, others were violently laid hands upon as they were going to their pulpits. Upon this they were all forced to desist from public preaching within two or three months after their places were declared vacant; except two—viz., Mr. Hamilton, of Killead, and Mr. Cunningham, of Antrim, who, through my Lord Massareene’s intercession with the bishop, obtained about half-a-year’s liberty after their brethren were silenced, only they must not lecture before preaching according to their former practice. Thus there came a black cloud over this poor Church. The old enemies became bitter and triumphed, and kept a searching and severe eye over the outed ministers that they might get some advantage of them. For generally they did reside in some places of their parishes, being excluded not only from their maintenance, but from their houses that the parishes had built for ministers; except those houses that were built by themselves and were their own property. They did also, as the danger and difficulty of that time allowed, visit the people from house to house; and sometimes had small meetings of them by parcels in several places of the parish in the night-time, which were narrowly pried into and sometimes gotten knowledge of, and by these observers and ministers called in question. Yet providence brought them off again. Besides, there were some who had been once of the brethren by profession and ordained by them, who now, turning with the times, became more dangerous than others.

The example which Bishop Taylor set in the summary ejection of the Presbyterians from their churches, was soon after followed by the other prelates of Ulster. To the ministers, this was now indeed "a day of darkness and of gloominess, a day of clouds and of thick darkness." Had the bishops deprived them only of their churches and maintenance, and cut them off from connection with Episcopacy, they would never have complained. But when they found themselves debarred from the exercises of their ministry, and forbidden, under heavy penalties, to preach, baptise, or publicly exhort their suffering people, they felt their situation to be peculiarly distressing. They were ready to sacrifice, and did nobly sacrifice, all worldly advantages for the testimony of a good conscience; but to be prohibited from what was to them their highest and most beloved work, the declaring of the glad tidings of salvation, and the winning of souls unto Christ—and that, too, after the declarations of their sovereign, whose restoration they had strenuously promoted, had led them to expect ample toleration—constituted the bitterest ingredient in that cup of affliction of which they were now constrained to drink. But neither the privations nor the temptations by which they were beset<sup>17</sup> could induce them to violate the sacred principles of conscience and of duty. They cheerfully "suffered the loss of all things," rather than submit to an unscriptural form of government and worship, and profess allegiance to a Church which, while it had renounced the headship of Christ, and surrendered the key of discipline to the civil magistrate, had assumed the power of decreeing rites and ceremonies, and adopted too many of the idolatrous and superstitious forms of the Church of Rome.

<sup>17</sup> Among these temptations was the mode of their re-ordination. In England, all ministers who conformed were obliged to disown their former ordination as irregular and invalid, and submit to be ordained by the bishops de novo. But in Ireland, Bramhall and the other prelates took a middle course, and adopted the following form of ordination, which professed not to invalidate their former orders, if they had any, but merely to supply what was wanting to the legal investiture of their office in accordance with the canons:—"Non annihilantes priores ordines (si quos habent) nec validitatem aut invaliditatem eorundem determinantes, multo minus omnes ordines sacros ecclesiarum forensicarum condemnantes, quos propriò judiciò relinquimus: sed solummodo suppletes quicquid prius defuit per canones Ecclesiæ Anglicanæ requisitum; et providentes paci Ecclesiæ ut schismatis tollatur occasio, et conscientiis fidelium satisfiat, nec ulli dubitant de ejus ordinatione aut actus suos presbyteriales tanquam invalidos aversentur. In cujus rei testimonium, &c., &c."—Neal, iv., 314; Birch's "Life of Tillotson," p. 191; Vesey's "Life of Bramhall."

In Ulster, SIXTY-ONE Presbyterian ministers, being almost the entire number who were then officiating in the province, were deposed from the ministry, and ejected out of their benefices by the northern prelates. Of this noble army of confessors "for the truth and simplicity of the Gospel of Christ," sixteen were members of the Presbytery of Down, fourteen of Antrim, ten of Route, eight of Tyrone, and thirteen of Lagan. These ministers enjoyed the painful though honourable pre-eminence of being the first to suffer in the three kingdoms, the Nonconformists of England not being ejected till the month of August in the following year, nor the Presbyterians of Scotland till the subsequent month of October, 1662.<sup>18</sup> They are, therefore, eminently entitled to the admiration and gratitude of posterity. They set an example of fortitude and integrity, which prepared and encouraged their brethren in the sister kingdoms to act with similar magnanimity; and thus conjointly exhibited to the world a convincing and instructive proof of the power of religion and of conscience, unparalleled in the annals of the Church's history. They merit, however, especial honour from their descendants in Ulster. Had they, tempted by preferment and worldly ease, apostatized from their principles and deserted their people, few traces of Presbyterianism, to which the inhabitants of Ulster owe so much of their civil and religious freedom, would have survived the subsequent persecutions of the Prelacy and the ruinous wars of the Revolution. These faithful men, indeed, not only at first replanted the Presbyterian Church in the province, and, under God, "caused it to take deep root and fill the land," but when "her hedges were broken down," and her enemies exulting over her destruction, supported by "the right hand of the Lord," they carefully repaired the breaches and upreared her shattered stem, watering it with their prayers, till "the hills were once more covered with the shadow of it, and her boughs were sent out to the encircling sea." Let the names, therefore, of the following "righteous men be held in everlasting remembrance!"

<sup>18</sup> The reason of the ministers being ejected in Ireland so long before their brethren in the sister kingdoms was this:—The old form of church-government and worship had never been abolished by law in Ireland; and, therefore, at the Restoration, Prelacy, being still the legal establishment, was immediately recognised and enforced. But both in England and in Scotland it had been abolished by acts of their respective parliaments, and the Directory substituted in room of the Common Prayer-book. It was necessary, therefore, that these acts should be first repealed, and new acts of parliament passed, before the bishops had power to proceed against those who did not conform.

<sup>19</sup> This valuable list is extracted from Wodrow (i., 324-5,) with some few corrections, and with the addition of the places where they officiated, so far as I have been able to discover them after many years' laborious research. I have prefixed the letter R to those who survived the Revolution. Wodrow introduces this list with the following observation:—"I have added an account of such Presbyterian ministers in the north of Ireland who refused conformity to Episcopacy there, and suffered severely enough for it; because I have always found the elder Presbyterian ministers in Ireland reckoning themselves upon the same bottom with, and as it were a branch of, the Church of Scotland. It stands as it comes to my hand under the correction of the reverend ministers of that kingdom." In Calamy's "Continuation," the reader will find the names of several Independent ministers who were also deposed at this period in Ireland.

The total number of ministers, associated together in presbyteries at this trying period throughout Ulster, was nearly seventy. Of these SEVEN only conformed to Prelacy. The other ministers deeply deplored these instances of unfaithfulness and defection. "There was another thing added to the affliction of the brethren, which was the falling-off of several of their number, and their embracing the snare laid before them. These were Mr. Mungo Bennett, Mr. Caldwell, Mr. Wallace, Mr. Robert Rowan, Mr. Andrew Rowan, Mr. Brown, of Bellaghy [Mr. William Mill or Milne], and afterwards Mr. James Fleming, who had stood out longer than the rest.<sup>20</sup> All these had come from Scotland with testimonials and recommendations from grave and godly ministers, for their hopefulness and piety, besides other qualifications of learning, prudence, &c. They were ordained by the Presbytery here with solemn engagements at their ordination to adhere to Pres-

<sup>20</sup> I find, from the Records in the First-Fruits Office, that the Rev. Andrew Rowan was admitted rector of Dunaghy or Clough, in the county of Antrim, on September 13, 1661, and that the Rev. George Wallace was admitted vicar of Holywood, in Down, on December 12, 1661; and from the "Liber Hiberniæ," that the Rev. Mungo Bennett was admitted rector of Coleraine on November 7, 1665. It does not appear with what benefices Caldwell and Robert Rowan were rewarded. Mr. Alexander Dunlop, mentioned above by Adair, was admitted vicar of Kilmore, in Down, in April, 1661, and Mr. Andrew Nesbitt was, at the same time, admitted vicar of Glenarm; so that these expectants were the first to receive the stipulated reward of their tergiversation. Of the ministers in Ulster not being Presbyterians, who enjoyed salaries from Cromwell's government (see Appendix), I find no less than eleven of these pensioners receiving benefices from the prelates. Thomas Vesey, admitted rector of Coleraine or Templepatrick [sic in MS.] September 26, 1661; Andrew Larve, rector of Kilmegan and Maghera, in Down, March, 1661, and afterwards vicar of Templepatrick, Kilbride, Donegore, and the Grange, November 3, 1662; Hugh Graffan, vicar of Saintfield, September 10, 1661; Daniel M'Neale, vicar of Billy, Culfeightrin, and Loughguile, September 12, 1661; Robert Young, rector of Culdaff, April, 1661; George Holland, archdeacon and rector of Dunboe, March, 1661; Archibald Glasgow, rector and vicar of Clondevadock, and of Tullyfernan and Aughnish, April, 1661; William Lindsey, rector of Bovevagh, April, 1661; Hugh Barclay, rector and vicar of Ray, April, 1661; Robert Echlin, rector and vicar of Ballee and Ardglass, September 24, 1661; and James Watson, precentor of Connor, March, 1661. Mr. William Mill or Milline, minister of Islandmagee, and originally from Aberdeen, in 1657, also conformed, and was appointed rector of the same place, March, 1661—62, and the next year promoted to the prebend of Kilroot. He was deprived in 1693 by the commissioners for visiting the diocese of Down and Connor. See Vol. III.

byterian government, the ends of the Covenant, and subordination to their brethren. Notwithstanding, in the hour of temptation and embracing this present world, they renounced the Covenant publicly, their ordination by the Presbytery, and were re-ordained by their bishop. Thereafter they turned other men than before; worldly, proud, severe on the people, who discountenanced them, and haters of those faithful ministers who once made them ministers. There was also one Dunlop and Mr. Andrew Nesbitt [expectants] who went the same way and proved no better than the rest. This Nesbitt, several years after, being sick, and expecting death, as it fell out, sent for Mr. Adair, his nearest neighbouring minister, whom he had often before chided and reflected on for gathering the people of the parish by parcels where Nesbitt was their curate, and had threatened severity to him for so doing, beside oppressing the people on account of nonconformity. Yet finding himself going out of the world he, with great expressions and much seeming seriousness, renounced the course he had been upon. He said he had sold his Master for a piece of bread, and had joined with a set of men that God was not among, a generation whom God would plague, and he doubted if there was mercy for him; with many words to that purpose. Mr. Adair told him that he was glad he was brought that length; he put him in mind of his former courses during these latter years, which had been very gross for oppression, pride, drunkenness, regardlessness of the Sabbath, lying, &c.; yet he added that if he were sincere in what he expressed as to his repentance and flying to Christ, there might be hope. But he was afraid that if he recovered that sickness, he would return again and forget his recantation. Mr. Nesbitt replied that through God's strength it should never be so. It is observable that those who turned to conformity from their brethren and the way of God, turned to be another kind of creatures than they had been generally. While they continued they were sober, and some of them well-gifted; when they conformed, they became loose, oppressive, proud, and divers of them profane."

Meanwhile, after an interval of nearly twenty years, the Irish parliament met on the 8th of May, and was opened by a sermon from Bishop Taylor. Archbishop Bramhall was chosen speaker of the lords; and Audley Mervyn, one of the members for Tyrone, who, in the year 1640, had impeached Bramhall and others of high treason, and had been a violent opponent of Prelacy, was now so ardent a Conformist that he was elected speaker of the commons. "In the House of Lords," writes Adair, "there was not one man who favoured the Presbytery save the Lord Massareene. There was some pains taken in the north to choose members for the House of Commons who might be favourable; and some were so, together with divers from Munster, who disrelished the bishops and ceremonies, who had been of Cromwell's party before, and were now to get their debentures established by parliament. But whatever were the principles and affections of some private men, the parliament did immediately establish the former episcopal laws of Ireland; and they put forth a DECLARATION or proclamation to this purpose, forbidding all to preach who would not conform; and ordered it to be sent through Ireland to every minister, to be read by him the next Sabbath after his receiving it.<sup>21</sup> This proclamation came before many of the brethren had been otherwise forced to desist, and was on that account particularly sent to them, which strengthened the hands of their opposers. It was moved by some in parliament to take severe courses with some of these ministers in order to terrify the rest. Yet none were nor could be found guilty of anything deserving punishment, except Mr. James Ker, who had deserted the King's interest, as already related, but yet had returned again to his brethren long before this. He, knowing they might take advantage of this, withdrew with his wife to Scotland, where he died shortly after.<sup>22</sup>

"The parliament of Ireland followed that of England not only in restoring the former way of government and worship, but in making an act for burning the Solemn League and Covenant.<sup>23</sup> This was accordingly done in all cities and towns through the kingdom, the magistrates in every place being directors and witnesses;<sup>24</sup> which as it was pleasing to the

<sup>22</sup> In the proceedings of the House of Lords, on the 11th of June, is the following entry relative to Mr. Ker:—"The bishop of Raphoe recommends a paper from the lords-justices to be read.—The said paper read. Ordered, that Mr. Carr, of Ballymoney, be sent for and brought up by a messenger of this house, to answer the contents of the said paper." (Journ., i., 246.) Mr. Ker evaded this order by escaping to Scotland, so that no further notice of him occurs in the Journals. The only other minister whose nonconformity exposed him to the censure of the lords was Mr. Boyd, who is thus noticed in the proceedings of the 27th of July, 1661:—"Ordered, that Mr. Boyd, of Aghadowy, for holding a conventicle at Desertoe! [near Garvagh], in the county of Derry, contrary to the declaration of this house, be examined by the judges of assize who ride that circuit, who are to proceed against him according to the nature of his offence."—Journ., i., 273.

<sup>23</sup> This order or declaration was passed by the lords on the 25th, and by the commons on the 27th of May. The Covenant is unceremoniously condemned as "schismatical, seditious, and treasonable;" and they order it to be burned in all cities and towns by the common hangman, and require the chief magistrate of the place to be present and see the order executed on the next market-day after its receipt. They conclude by declaring, "that whosoever shall, by word or deed, by sign or writing, go about to defend or justify the said treasonable covenant, shall be accounted and esteemed as an enemy to his sacred majesty and to the public peace and tranquillity of his Church and kingdom."—Lords' Journ., i., 240.

episcopal party and the profane in the land, together with the Papists, so it was a sad mark of the times, and an evil omen in the eyes of those who had conscientiously engaged in it, to see that sacred oath thus with contempt violated. It had been taken in the north of Ireland with great solemnity, as already related; and as long as it was stuck to by those who first engaged in it in Scotland and England, their undertakings were signally blessed. When it was broken and deserted, first by the sectarian party in England, confusion in Church and State had its rise from their proceedings. Yet in the usurper's time those who were true Covenanters were the only persons who stuck to the King's interest, as well as to sound principles in religion; and that in all the three kingdoms. For those who had no liking to it and were opposers of it, were the greatest compliers with the usurpers, and generally took the engagement in support of the commonwealth without king and house of lords, whereas the true Covenanters did refuse and suffer upon that account, not daring to violate the solemn oath.

"This appeared particularly in those parts of Ireland where the Covenant had been before administered, and afterwards this engagement pressed with much rigour. Yea, it may be said this oath was one special means of bringing the King to his throne; being looked on then as a king in Covenant, who it was, in charity, supposed could not in conscience and honour but pursue the ends of it, which he had so solemnly undertaken both before and at his coronation. However, little opposition or testimony was given against these proceedings in parliament; the party who was otherwise minded partly seeing the current of defection so strong that they thought it was beyond their power to stop the course. The parliaments of England and Scotland had already done the same, and it was accounted a crime to avow the Covenant. Neither did that party so much as move for ease to tender consciences in the matter of conformity, although they had ground from the King's declaration at Breda and his declaration after he came home ; knowing that if they appeared in any kind against the course of the times it might prejudice their worldly interest. The parliament being then engaged in settling their newly-gotten estates, they said that when once that were finished, they would then appear. But it was so ordered that they were disappointed in a great measure of their expectations ; for the parliament was dissolved, and these matters [respecting the settlement of their estates] left in uncertainty.

“The ministers of the north, in this juncture, gave themselves especially to prayer, and did cry to God for help. They sometimes also privately met together for that end in societies, to encourage one another and take mutual advice how to carry themselves. They thought it their duty, though their hope was very small, to make an essay for some toleration or immunity from the rigour of laws made over their consciences by petitioning the parliament. For this end they sent three of their number, Mr. John Hart, Mr. Thomas Hall, and Mr. William Richardson, to Dublin, with a commission subscribed by all the brethren of several societies ; that, as they were advised by friends in Dublin, they might present a petition to parliament in their own and brethren's names. Accordingly they went thither and drew up a petition, but could not get it presented ; their best friends in Dublin advising them to return home, after long attendance for an opportunity, and wait there on God for a better time. In this petition the brethren owned their conscientious and peaceable subjection to the laws either actively wherein they found clearness, or passively wherein they were of a different persuasion. They declared what had been their carriage in the usurper's time in general ; and they annexed to it a particular narrative of their actings and sufferings during that period, of their address and petition to the King on his return, of his majesty's gracious answers to them, as well as his declaration at Breda, and other grounds of hope that he had given to those who were of tender consciences, being otherwise good subjects. Notwithstanding these things, they complained of their present usage by the bishops: and petitioned for liberty to preach the Gospel without those impositions to which they could not agree with peace to their consciences. This was the substance of that petition which could not have access to be read in the parliament.

"This essay failing, the ministers generally took themselves to the houses that they had either formerly of their own, or had lately built in their several parishes; and judged it their duty, as far as it was possible, to stay among their people, and to take such opportunities for their edification as the times could admit: partly conversing with them singly in private, and partly gathering them at convenient times in small companies, and exhorting them from the Word. They resolved to go about their duty with as great prudence as they could; considering they had many adversaries and watchful eyes upon them, and not a few to represent them to the magistrate as disloyal and rebellious persons, if any ground had been given. They thought it more suitable to their case and more profitable to their flocks to do somewhat among them in a private way, without noise or alarming the magistrate, and thus continue among their people; than to appear publickly in preaching in the fields, which could have lasted but a very short time, and would have deprived them of the opportunity of ordinarily residing among their people; which, in the case of some who took another course, came to pass.

"For at this time, there were two or three young men<sup>25</sup> who had come from Scotland, and had been but lately ordained by the Presbytery here; and who, intending to return to Scotland and put themselves out of the bishop's reverence [jurisdiction] in this country, resolved to do some good before they went. They therefore called the people to solemn and great meetings, sometimes in the night and sometimes in the day, in solitary places whither people in great abundance and with great alacrity and applause flocked to them. There they spoke much against the bishops and the times. This matter of preaching, as it was in itself commendable and faithful when rightly managed, did exceedingly please most people. These men were cried up as the only courageous, faithful, and zealous ministers by the common sort of people, and by those who had great zeal but little judgment or experience, though not approved of by the more serious, prudent, and experienced Christians. The manner of it in daring the magistrate openly, and calling great assemblies together in despite of authority, was by that sort of people thought great stoutness and gallantry.

“The people upon this not only countenanced and cried them up, but liberally contributed for them; generally neglecting their own ministers who laboured more privately, and in some sort with greater difficulty among them. Thus they continued for a considerable time, going from one place and from one parish to another, as well as from one county to another, under disguise and oft in the night-time. Although the magistrate heard and took great notice of it, yet they were not for a long time owned, in order to see if the rest would follow their steps, which many were longing for, that so they might have greater ground to accuse the whole Scottish Presbyterians of designs of rebellion, which many were oft suggesting to the Duke of Ormond, but could not get grounds to build their accusations upon. Only they made use of this practice of these young men, as much as they could, for a reflection upon the whole. And indeed all the rest of the ministers at this time were in a very dangerous and sad case. They were beaten with rods on all hands. Being put from the public ministry by the magistrate, they must walk prudently and peaceably; and yet for a time are counted fools and frantic for the sake of a few of their number, though they endeavoured with hazard and more than ordinary trouble to be useful to their congregations as the times could bear. But yet they are counted timorous cowards, and all they did was nothing, because they went not to the hills. They lived upon any small thing they had of their own among their people, without maintenance from them; and yet must see others bountifully gratified. They must walk prudently, and yet keep up union and affection with an imprudent people. They were convinced of the imprudence of these men, and yet must not disapprove of them lest they lose their people. They saw themselves in little quietness and great hazard from the magistrate, and yet dared not in conscience lay the blame on those who occasioned their hazard.

“I am far from judging these young men, or questioning the integrity or good intentions of any of them. I am persuaded of one of them, Mr. Michael Bruce, who was most noticed and indeed did most good at that time, that he was a person singularly gifted, truly zealous and faithful, but also peaceable and orderly in his temper and conversation with his brethren, and in his whole way a very Nathaniel; of all which he hath given proof in the Church of Christ for many years since that time. This I judge a duty to say lest any blot should remain on that truly godly and worthy brother. He was then but a youth, and so were the rest. They considered not what hazard their way brought on the whole brethren from the magistrate in depriving them of the small opportunity they had to do good among their people, nor how it occasioned contempt and reflection from the more injudicious and uncharitable of the people, who usually are the greatest number; nor yet how it cut themselves short of occasion to do more good to their own congregations if they had carried themselves more privately and prudently. For within a short time they were forced to flee the country<sup>26</sup> without the benefit of their presence and labouring among them as others did, to the great advantage of their flocks. Now the people, who had so much cried up the carriage and zeal of these youths before, and condemned the way of the rest of the ministers, soon saw the imprudence of the one and the true prudence and courage of the other in sticking to them under difficulties and discouragements around them. They were convinced of this more and more when that way the prudenter ministers took did, by degrees and insensibly without much observation of the magistrate, make way for the more public exercise of their ministry, as afterwards it proved. And it is to be observed that the faithful ministers of Ireland, the first planters of the Gospel in these bounds, when they were put from the public exercise of their ministry by the bishops, did not use that way of gathering the people to the fields. But they dwelt privately in their houses, and received as many as came to them of their own parishes; though they had greater provocations to do so, because they got not the same liberty, but were shortly after chased out of the country by pursuivants from Dublin.

“And let the reader know the end for which this passage has been observed:—not to reflect on honest men, but to caution and tell ministers who are embodied with a society of godly ministers, and by their solemn engagements at their ordination obliged to walk in subordination to their brethren; that they take not singular courses of their own in such cases, though sometimes it may look like zeal; nor yet walk in a separate way, especially where they may have the advice of their brethren. For a society of godly ministers may expect more assistance and light than a single person. Besides, to my observation and that of many others it hath been found that brethren, who have taken these singular courses of their own in this Church, divers of whom might be instanced both of our own number and coming from Scotland since these times, have within a very short time been rendered useless in it; and some of them deprived all the rest of a great measure of that extraordinary respect and applause which they had from the people; wherein the hand of God might have been seen. I only except that worthy brother before mentioned, who did what he did in the singleness of his heart; and who, after long and sharp sufferings both in Scotland and in England, returned to this Church and was eminently useful in it."

<sup>26</sup> So early as the 17th of September in this year, the Scottish council of state ordered a letter to be written to the sheriff of Clydesdale, to apprehend two fugitive ministers from Ireland and transmit them to Edinburgh. (Wodrow, i., 221.) “It seems plain,” adds Wodrow, “that they were two Presbyterian ministers who had fled over from the persecution of the prelates in Ireland,” but he was unable to ascertain their names.

On the 4th of November, the Duke of Ormond, now in distinguished favour at court, was nominated lord-lieutenant of Ireland, but he did not come over till July in the following year. The lords-justices, in the meantime, continued in office, and conducted the government upon the same principles of blind subjection to the prelates by which they had been hitherto guided. Whenever their own prudence or leniency induced them to relax somewhat of the rigour of the penal statutes against nonconformity, the vigilant and intolerant bishops soon called for renewed severities. In the beginning of the year 1662, in compliance with petitions from the Romanists, whom Charles was already desirous of favouring, and who had been indicted under the statute of Elizabeth for not attending the service of the Established Church, the lords-justices had directed the judges of assize in the several circuits to suspend, till further orders, the execution of that penal statute. "Soon after," writes Lord Orrery, in the month of April, to the Duke of Ormond, "the Nonconformists of the north, being also indicted for the same offences, we gave the like orders for them; but would not dispense with the penalties of the law to such as should hold unlawful assemblies or conventicles. Though we would connive at their not doing what they should, yet we would not connive at their doing what they should not." Alarmed at these indications of toleration, the bishops immediately waited on the lords-justices; and after declaiming against the pernicious effects of such measures, and the danger thereby accruing to the Church, they persuaded them to issue a proclamation, dated the 30th of April, in which they state, that as "recusants, nonconformists, and sectaries, had grown worse by clemency," no further indulgence would be granted by the State.<sup>27</sup> At length, on the 27th of July, Ormond arrived from England, and on the following day was formally sworn into office as "lord-lieutenant general and general governor of Ireland." His policy towards the Presbyterians, continued the same as that of the lords-justices. He was disposed to sympathize with them for their former sufferings on behalf of the King, and to tolerate them so long as they lived peaceably and did not excite the jealousy of the bishops; but he was too ready at the instigation of their ecclesiastical foes, to abridge their freedom and visit them with penalties. On the whole, the general mildness of his administration, which continued during seven years, presented a remarkable contrast to the unprecedented severity with which the Nonconformists and Presbyterians were treated at this period both in England and in Scotland.

<sup>27</sup> "Orrery's State Letters," i., 109. It is singular that Ware in his "Annals" (apud an.), and Cox, in his "History" (ii., Charles II., 41, style this proclamation an indulgence to dissenters, though Lord Orrery's statement and the preamble, which is all that I could discover of the proclamation itself (see "Conduct of the Dissenters," p. 11), clearly show that it was designed to repress, and not to favour, the Nonconformists. Lord Orrery, in the remaining part of his letter to Ormond, thus states the difficulty and hazard attendant on a rigid execution of the penal laws:—"The thing is very weighty in its consequences, and difficult in the resolution; and therefore your grace's judgment, which I humbly beg, is most requisite for our guidance. If the laws be fully put in execution, ten parts of eleven of the people will be dissatisfied; if they be not put in execution, the Church will be dissatisfied, and sects and heresies continued, I doubt, for ever; and if any of the sects be indulged, it will be partiality not to indulge to all; if none be favoured, it may be unsafe. This is to me a short state of the case, and too true a one. If England and Scotland fall roundly upon the Papists and Nonconformists, and we do not, Ireland will be the sink to receive them all. If they are fallen upon equally in the three kingdoms, may not they all unite to disturb the peace?"—Letters, &c. supra.

“Throughout this year 1662, the poor afflicted ministers in the country continued in performance of what duty they could to their people, as the times would permit; and in peaceableness and loyalty to the magistrate. Yet they could not guard against the calumnies and misrepresentations of their observing adversaries, clergymen and others, who cast aspersions upon them to the duke, both as to their principles and practices. The Lord Massareene, their constant and great friend, dwelling then at Dublin, and being one of the privy-council, and searching into all affairs, particularly what concerned the ministers of the north, he wrote to some of the ministers of his acquaintance, showing it was convenient for them and their brethren to offer a vindication of themselves from the many informations that were given in against them to the lord-lieutenant. He also sent a draught of that vindication to them, to consider if they could subscribe it. The draught was fair, giving an account of their principles, particularly as to loyalty, with a narrative of their actings and sufferings for the King. Yet the brethren considering this particular way was not required by the duke, but only my Lord Massareene’s overture; and withal that it was dangerous to draw up such a paper so as to please court lords, without saying more than was right and suitable to their consciences; therefore they judged it more fit to forbear a particular vindication. Yet they found themselves necessitated to do something. For my Lord Massareene, hearing many speeches against them among the great ones in Dublin, told the duke and some of the council that he expected some of the Scotch ministers to be shortly in Dublin to vindicate themselves. The brethren understanding this, sent three of their number, viz., Messrs. Patrick Adair, Andrew Stuart, and William Semple, to Dublin. They gave them instructions to consult with Lord Massareene about their case, and a commission to make their application to the duke for some token of his favour in their present case, as they should find convenient, or should be advised by Lord Massareene and their friends there.

“Accordingly, these brethren went about the beginning of August, 1662, and continued there till the end of October. At their first coming to Dublin, instead of a vindication, they drew up a petition to be presented to the duke to the same purpose as the petition mentioned before that was intended for the parliament, owning their principles and begging immunity from bishops and ceremonies. They also gave in another paper showing the reasonable ground they had for humbly expecting a favourable answer from his grace. The duke was informed immediately of their coming to town; and they continued there a fortnight before they presented their petition, or made any application to him. This was owing to my Lord Massareene’s persuasion, the ground whereof was this. That noble lord being truly concerned for the liberty and comfort of both ministers and people in the north, as well as of the whole Nonconformists of Ireland, did of himself devise some overtures which, if complied with, might be a favour to Nonconformists, and a service to the King and kingdom. Of these he had discoursed to the duke. He essayed to get them accepted in favour of all Nonconformists; and he thought that these being granted, it would make the ministers’ application easy. But the duke said, he had not power to comply with them, neither was he forward for any such motions in favour of Nonconformists. These proposals therefore vanished. Meantime the duke, knowing of the ministers being in town, became jealous and angry that they did not make application to him. He said to the Lord Montgomery

[now Earl of Mount-Alexander] and to Sir Arthur Forbes that since they came not, he would send for them. When the brethren heard this, the next day they presented the petition to himself, being introduced by Lord Massareene. After inquiring if they had any more to say, and they answered, nothing; he said he would do what was incumbent for him. The next day he said to the former noble persons, being familiar with them, that he was in a strait what to do with these ministers; for by their petition he perceived they had suffered FOR the King, and now they were likely to suffer UNDER the King.

“After waiting several days, the ministers came to one of the duke’s secretaries, Sir George Lane, to remind him of their petition and its answer. He gave them some queries from the duke to answer in writing:—1. What those things were wherein they scrupled to act? 2. Who were the persons that wronged them and wherein? 3. Who of them were put from their houses? And, 4. Who they were for whom they petitioned? They answered to the first, that, having been ordained ministers of the Gospel by presbyters, they were altogether unclear to receive another ordination; and withal they replied that however they were clear for the doctrinal articles contained in the thirty-nine articles of the Church of England, as well as for the doctrines contained in the articles of Ireland concluded in the convocation at Dublin in 1615, yet they were not clear to worship God according to the forms and ceremonies prescribed in the Book of Common Prayer. To the second they answered, that albeit they incline not to complain of grievances, that not being their present aim, nor the aim of these other ministers, yet it is evident that for Nonconformity several of their ministers were in hazard of suffering by the civil law, and of excommunication by ecclesiastical courts, before which some of them were standing already processed, as well as of other sad consequences of that sentence; the names of these being particularly expressed by the brethren. To the third query they answered, that divers particular persons might have grievances of this nature, yet they did studiously in their petition forbear to mention these things, lest they should be thought more sensible of inferior losses than the great loss of their ministry; and lest they should seem to doubt of the justice of those who were appointed to hear and redress such grievances. To the fourth and last query they gave the duke a list, being the same persons who subscribed the address to the King about two years before.

“After divers days’ attendance they got that paper given to the duke. Thereafter he caused their petition to be read in council and the other papers all subscribed by the ministers, as was by him required. Divers in the council and such bishops as were present spake against the ministers and their papers with great animosity and indignation; and said they should be punished for contumacy and open professing against the laws; and that it was unfit they should have liberty to live among people to poison them. There were also reflections upon them as they were Scotch Presbyterians, and some remembered the oppressions done by the Scotch army while they were in Ulster. Others held their peace. My Lord Massareene with no less boldness and animosity for them. The duke himself was moderate; he said they were unhappy who first suffered FOR the King, and then suffered UNDER him; and he thought it just that what the King had promised them should be performed, and said that what these ministers had spoken in their petition or answer to his queries, should not tend to their prejudice, since they spake their conscience, and since he himself had required them to subscribe it. He said he resolved to give no answer till he had examined the truth of their assertion anent the King’s promises. My Lord Anglesey, being present at that time, was questioned in it. But he stifled any testimony that might seem to displease, and said he was no Presbyterian. My Lord Massareene openly told him that he sometimes professed the contrary; and that if he did not faithfully witness what he had heard from the King, God would make it meet with him another day. The brethren thereafter gave him a paper putting him in remembrance of what the King had said when he was present, in which the King had spoken to the ministers in their application to him as a friend and with a kind of familiarity. After this the brethren were informed that Lord Anglesey did own the paper they had given in, as a narrative of the brethren's answer from the King. But after much attendance and means used with all who seemed to be friends, and after intercession with the duke, and after many fair promises, the result of all was that they must live according to the law, that they might serve God in their own families without gathering multitudes together, they living peaceably and to that purpose. This answer was left in writing the very hour the duke was taking his horse for Kilkenny; and with difficulty a copy only was obtained by the ministers, but not the original.

"After these brethren had returned home, the young men formerly mentioned, then remaining in the country, took the more liberty, and inconsiderate people took advantage, as if the duke had granted the brethren some great thing. This being observed by the bishops, they sent a complaint to the duke that he had given liberty to the Nonconformists. Upon which he sent a copy of the paper to them, but not to the brethren who had so long and with so great weariness waited on him. However, the brethren this year, following their former courses, lived without great molestation, performing what duty they could to their several parishes, and having their private societies one with another, in which they began to think of a way not only of constant correspondence together, but of walking harmoniously in these times of trouble and difficulty. They had their meetings together to that purpose, and had correspondents from one meeting to another, as they could overtake."

Thus, after a gloomy period of nearly two years' duration, the dark and portentous cloud which enveloped the Church began to break and afford a glimmering of sunshine, and some prospect of returning peace. But the intrigues of a few restless and ambitious men in Dublin, with whom one or two ministers in Ulster chanced to be very remotely connected, unhappily destroyed this favourable hope of tranquillity for the Church, and exposed the ministers to renewed sufferings.

CHAPTER XVIII.

A.D. 1663—1684.

Blood's plot—Unsuccessful attempt to engage the Presbyterians in it—Conspirators apprehended—Three ministers summoned to Dublin—The ministers of Down and Antrim imprisoned—Scots disarmed—Examination of Stewart and Greg—Four of the conspirators executed—Ulster ministers forced to leave the kingdom—A few permitted to remain—Bishop Leslie imprisons four ministers during six years—Various attempts to procure their liberation—Gradual improvement in the condition of the Church in Ulster—Ministers return by degrees—Causes of this favourable change—Lord Roberts, the lord-lieutenant, favours the Presbyterians—A general committee established in lieu of a synod—Its first acts—Sends contributions to the Scottish exiles in Holland—Jealousy of the Episcopal clergy—Boyle, bishop of Down, summons twelve ministers to his court—Sir Arthur Forbes interferes in their behalf—Deaths of several ministers in Down and Antrim—Bishop Boyle prohibited by the primate from proceeding against the ministers—A seasonable relief to the Church—Contrasted with the persecutions in the sister kingdoms—Meeting-houses erected—Accident in Dublin—Case of David Houston—Rules for ordination—Pension granted by Charles II.—Fast in the Lagan—Four ministers imprisoned—Presbyterians again subjected to persecution.

THE government of Ireland, after the Restoration was conducted with considerable ability and success. Many conflicting interests and claims were peaceably adjusted; the adventurers were satisfied, the army reduced, the Church restored, the Romanists pacified, the numerous sectaries that prevailed in Leinster and Munster repressed, while no popular commotion during three years disturbed the tranquillity of the kingdom. A secret conspiracy, however, had, during the last year, been formed by a few disappointed and restless spirits, the detection of which interrupted for a time the public peace, and involved many innocent persons, especially among the Presbyterian ministers of Ulster, in serious difficulties. This conspiracy is generally known by the name of BLOOD'S PLOT, the origin, progress, and consequences of which are thus detailed by Adair:—

“In December, 1662, there was a ground laid for trouble not only to Nonconformists in other parts of Ireland, but to the ministers and people of the north. There was then in Ireland a considerable number of old Cromwellists, as they were called, who had a rooted antipathy to the King's government, and some profession of religion, such as it was. These in and about Dublin finding themselves not in the condition they had been in before the King's restoration, and finding oppression by bishops and by other ways growing upon them, began to contrive amongst themselves an overturning of the state of bishops and rectifying the civil government, and restraining the Papists from that great liberty and countenance they had enjoyed, and furthermore securing a liberty of conscience to themselves as they had enjoyed in Cromwell's time. About this they consulted much with one another in Dublin in their meetings for that purpose, and agreed amongst themselves in their design. They had many considerable persons both of the country and army who were privy to it and secret favourers of it, who would not yet appear. They sent to England to acquaint others of their principles there, and acquainted them with it, and were approved and promised assistance, if need required. One Thomas Blood was a principal actor in this contrivance. He had for some time been an officer in the King's army against the first parliament, and was a true cavalier. Thereafter he had come to Ireland, where he had some interest in land near Dublin; and falling into much acquaintance with one Mr. Lecky, his brother-in-law, a minister of the Presbyterian persuasion, and a man of good discourse and learning, he was drawn to own Presbyterian principles. Thereafter, by the instigation of Lecky and others, he was persuaded to engage as the principal actor in this plot, being a person singularly fitted for such a design, in regard of courage, subtility, strength of body, and great spirit, and who had experience in martial affairs. This man, with his associates, having had many consultations among themselves, thought it fit to try if they could draw in the Presbyterians of the north to join with them, they pretending the ends of the Covenant with them.

“Accordingly Blood and Lecky, by the advice and consent of the rest, came to the north to try the ministers and best of the people there. They first visited Mr. Greg, Mr. Stewart [Donaghadee], and Captain James Moor, of Ballybrega [in Killinchy], calling them together to Mr. Greg’s house, where they proposed the business to them aggravating the iniquities of the times, the usurpation of the bishops, the tyranny of their courts, the increase of Popery, and misgovernment in every affair. As to what concerned the good of the people, they declared there were a number, very considerable and well-wishers to a reformation, desiring a redress of these things. yet without wronging the King’s just authority, and were engaged in that design, if the ministers and people of these parts would concur, it might be an acceptable service, and much promote the cause. They declared not the particular way how to get their design effected; but said, if these three men would send to Dublin their thoughts of it, and any assurance of concurrence, they would then know the particular methods which were to be followed in the design. The three persons that were thus applied unto being unacquainted with any such motions, were at first amazed at the folly or knavery, or both, of these so despicable persons, who looked more like trepanners than anything else. They desired two things of them, first, that they would utter nothing prejudicial to lawful authority in their hearing; and secondly, that being neither acquainted with the ends they aimed at, nor the means they thought of, they could say nothing but in general, that God's ends by lawful means when proposed could not be rejected by good men; but withal they told them, that if they intended any secret evil, what a slander it should be to their profession who were never seen to plot unlawfully for shunning what troubles God brought them unto. As for going to Dublin, they would know shortly whether they would do it or not, and so they parted.

“Being thus discouraged by these three, to whom they opened their business, they made no further attempt upon any in Down or Antrim, but went to Lagan and Armagh, where they met with the like discouragement, except from one or two ministers, who afterwards were discovered to be of their mind—viz., Mr. M'Cormick [Magherally] and Mr. Crookshanks [Raphoe]. From that they went to the south and west of Ireland, where they drew their purpose to a great height; yet they never corresponded more with any in the north, or with the Scotch, who gave them nothing but discouragement. Notwithstanding they, by their private consultations and meetings at Dublin, and correspondence with their confederates in other parts of Ireland, carried on their business. But there being one admitted to their secret contrivances in Dublin, who secretly opened their whole designs and proceedings to the duke, the duke commanded him to continue in their society, and daily inform him of their proceedings, till the time they thought their business ripe. They were at length prevented and surprised on the 22d of May, 1663. The plotters had appointed that morning to be the time wherein they would first surprise the castle of Dublin, and take the duke's person into custody. For that end they had a considerable party in the town over night, chief men of that party, with a considerable number of men ready for their purpose. But their whole motion being known to the duke, he that morning prevented them, and apprehended the principal persons, among whom was Mr. William Lecky;<sup>1</sup> only Blood escaped,* who may be called the head of the plot. There was found among them their intended declaration, wherein they pretended the ends of the Covenant, showing the necessity of taking up arms because of the growth of Popery and the oppression of the bishops.<sup>2</sup> But they were generally persons of Oliver's party, who, before that, had forsaken the Covenant, though it was alleged that a party of the standing army was engaged with them, but persons of no right or solid principles. There was also found an account of the names of those principally engaged; but no mention of the three in the north to whom Blood and Lecky had before applied; for these men had given Blood no encouragement or ground to expect any concurrence from them. Neither did those three reveal the matter to their brethren, lest the revealing of it should prove occasion of trouble to their brethren thereafter.

"Notwithstanding, the duke remembering that Messrs. Adair,

[<sup>2</sup> "In Sylvester's Life of Baxter iii., 88' there is an extraordinary account of the subsequent career of Blood. When he escaped to England, he lived for some time at Ramford, where he followed the medical profession, under the assumed name of Dr. Clarke. He then attempted to take the crown and crown jewels out of the Tower, and had all but succeeded when he was made prisoner. When brought into the royal presence, he told the King that he took the crown, not as a thief, but as an enemy, thinking that lawful which was done in war; and that, if his life were taken away, it would be revenged. The King not only pardoned him, but subsequently often admitted him to his presence, some say 'because his gallantry took much with the King, having been a soldier of his father's'—most say 'that he put the King in fear of his life,' and came off upon condition that he would keep the discontented party quiet."—Adair's Narrative, p. 273, note.]

Stewart, and Semple had been a considerable time in Dublin about half-a-year before this, and knowing the plotters had begun to meditate their business about that time, he became jealous of these three, and immediately sent orders to apprehend them, and send them up to Dublin by a guard. But the Lord Mount-Alexander having special acquaintance with Mr. Stewart, and being persuaded of his loyalty, interceded with the duke that he should not be sent for. Though my Lord Massareene was a privy-counsellor, yet he knew not, at the first, of sending for Mr. Adair. But, upon knowledge of it, he went to the duke, and spoke as much for Mr. Adair's loyalty as Lord Mount-Alexander had done for Mr. Stewart. He so far prevailed that Mr. Adair should come of himself to Dublin without a guard, and clear himself to the duke. This letter he wrote to Mr. Adair, and sent it by post. But before it came, Mr. Adair had been apprehended in his own house [at Cairncastle, between Larne and Glenarm] by a party of the Earl of Donegall's troop, and secured close prisoner in the gaol of Carrickfergus for three nights. Lord Massareene also wrote a letter to his lady's nephew, Sir Arthur Chichester, then lieutenant of the troop, declaring the duke's pleasure, and that if Mr. Adair were taken before that letter came, he should use him civilly. This he did accordingly, sending only one trooper along with Mr. Adair in company with him and his servant; and also wrote a favourable letter to the duke by that trooper in Mr. Adair's behalf. When Mr. Adair came to Dublin, that noble lord was pleased to intercede again with the duke, that Mr. Adair should be committed to his custody, he becoming bail for his appearance, which the duke upon perusal of Sir Arthur's letter easily granted. Thus Mr. Adair had a free confinement in Lord Massareene's house and the city for three months thereafter; and though he sent divers petitions to the duke to call and examine him of that plot, yet he was never called or examined, but after three months he was remanded to his own house by a warrant under the duke's hand, with only a certification that he would live peaceably.

"Meantime Sir Arthur Forbes was in all haste sent to the Lagan, a place of which the duke had great jealousy, to examine the ministers and suspected gentlemen there, which he did, and upon examination found no ground that any in their country were concerned in the plot; except that Mr. John Hart,<sup>3</sup> having been in Dublin upon occasions the winter before, some of the plotters had applied to him, as they had done to the two brethren in Down. But he had rejected the motion; only in his examination he spoke a word unadvisedly which brought Mr. Thomas Boyd,<sup>4</sup> a worthy man, into great trouble. For in vindicating himself, not remembering what hazard it might bring to Mr. Boyd, he said to Sir Arthur, he had abhorred that motion as Mr. Boyd in Dublin knew. This examination being returned to Dublin gave the duke suspicion that Mr. Boyd was upon the plot; whereas it only had been proposed to him, and he had refused to be concerned in it. Upon which he was immediately apprehended and kept long a close prisoner, and oft sent for to the duke, but would confess nothing that he knew of the plot, not knowing what Mr. Hart had said. This did the more irritate the duke against him, knowing by Mr. Hart's deposition that he had not been ignorant of it: till at last the duke, in a fury and with more threatening language, did show him the deposition. Whereupon he finding no way of evasion was forced to confess the way he knew of it; which was this, that Blood and Lecky, before their going to the north last winter, had proposed the business to him, but he would give no countenance to the design. The duke inquired what they did there; he said, they had spoken to Mr. Greg and Mr. Stewart but heard no more of it; and supposed they had gotten no satisfying answer from these men. This brought these two brethren into much trouble thereafter, and himself hardly escaped the worst. But God's providence wrought for the innocent gentleman, though some hungry courtiers were gaping for his estate. Yet he had many friends by his wife, who were men of quality and interest with the duke.

<sup>3</sup> In the "Life of Blair," Wodrow Society edition, it is said that this Mr. Hart had been formerly minister at Crail, in Fifeshire (p. 449). From a note towards the end of this chapter, it appears that Hart was minister at Hamilton.

<sup>4</sup> This Mr. Boyd is, I believe, the same person who was afterwards expelled from the House of Commons on account of this plot. He was one of the members for the borough of Bangor, in the county of Down. See Note 6 of this chapter.

"But to return to the ministers. Though Mr. Semple [of Letterkenny, in Donegal] was in the same order to be apprehended with Mr. Adair, yet being at a great distance, and Sir Arthur Forbes upon examination finding no ground of accusation against him or any of his brethren in the Lagan except Mr. Hart, he took bail of them to appear when called, and they found no more trouble of this plot. But the noise of the plot becoming great, the duke and those about him could not lay aside their jealousies of the Scotch. Therefore, within three weeks after its breaking up, the whole ministers of Down and Antrim, who could be found, were in one day apprehended, in the middle of June. The ministers of Antrim were brought to Carrickfergus, where they had liberty to be together in two private houses; and though guards were upon them, yet they had the benefit of mutual society, where they remained for about two months.

"The ministers of Down were at first more hardly dealt with. They were sent to the King's castle at Carlingford, being seven in number, viz., Messrs John Drysdale, John Greg, Andrew Stewart, Alexander Hutchinson, William Richardson, Gilbert Kennedy,<sup>5</sup> and James Gordon. They at first were put or pounded in a narrow room on the top of the house, far from friends or acquaintances, where they were in danger of starving, but that God stirred up the heart of a woman in the place, a stranger called Mrs. Clark, to supply them with necessaries. They were for a fortnight kept very close, till they were advised by Mr. Francis Hamilton, an officer of the company there, to write to my Lord Dungannon, who procured them the liberty of the town in the day time, they returning to their narrow room at night, lying on the floor four or five of them, as it were, in one bed. In the meantime, while the ministers, who never heard of the plot, nor had even dreamt of any such thing, were thus upon groundless jealousies used; there came orders for disarming all the Scotch in the country, which were vigorously, closely, and suddenly executed. All men's arms were taken from them, without respect of persons, by what standing forces and troops were in the country; though it never came to be known, and it is indeed utterly improbable, that any one person in the country had ever known the least of it, except only Captain Moor, as before related; who, a little after, was sent for and kept close prisoner in the castle of Dublin for a long time. However, the people carried peaceably; and their innocence in this matter, together with that of the ministers, did at last appear even to the duke's conviction.

“But the ministers' fears were, within a little, greatly alarmed upon occasion of that passage mentioned before — of Mr. Boyd's discovering the coming of Blood and Lecky to the north, and speaking to Mr. Greg and Mr. Stewart about the plot. When this was known, about the midst of July, orders were immediately sent to the governor of Carlingford to send these men to Dublin with a guard; and that in their coming thither they should have no access to one another, which was accordingly done. For after a month's imprisonment in Carlingford, where their mutual society much sweetened their hard lot, these two worthy brethren were taken from the rest, and separately, without any intimation of anything to them, were sent by two guards that same day to Dublin, and committed immediately to very close prisons among those who were truly upon the plot, without at first any accommodation. They did not see one another by the way coming, nor in the prison till the April following. After a few days, they were examined in the prison by the Earl of Mount-Alexander and the Lord Dunganon as to what access they had to the plot. Mr. Stewart, having advice from my Lord Massareene conveyed secretly by Mr. Adair's means to him, to be ingenuous in his confession (my lord being confident that in his circumstances this would be safest for him), did freely acknowledge what had passed between them and Blood, as was before delivered. Whereupon these lords told him, if there was no more between them there was no hazard to him. But Mr. Greg, not having that same advice, it being impossible to get it conveyed to him, which Mr. Stewart had, did upon his examination stand resolutely to his denial that he knew anything of the proceedings of that plot; for indeed he did not hear of anything anent it after Blood's parting from him. But after a day or two, the keepers telling him that Mr. Stewart had confessed all to these lords, he not knowing Mr. Stewart's reason for being so free, wrote a line or two in Latin to Mr. Stewart, challenging him for his confession to those noblemen, and telling him he had undone himself and them both. This paper he thought secretly to convey by the soldier who kept the door of the prison, and hid it within a paper of confections which he sent to Mr. Stewart in another part of the prison. But the soldiers, suspecting there might be such correspondence, opened the paper, and, finding this line, carried it to the sergeant-at-arms who kept the prison. He immediately carried it to the duke, who was by it much irritated against Mr. Greg; and it occasioned his being deprived of much favour in prison, which Mr. Stewart had. Though this writing of that line was but an inconsiderate act in worthy Mr. Greg, and he had hard usage upon that account, yet God had endued him with an invincible spirit, so that he carried his hard usage with great and undaunted courage; being conscious to himself that what he had said to his examiners was true. Yea, the keepers of the prison, who were witnesses of his carriage and Christian magnanimity, confessed he was of a great spirit. Mr. Stewart, within five or six weeks after his imprisonment, had the liberty of the city, being under a thousand pounds bond not to depart the city without leave. But Mr. Greg was kept close prisoner, and therein endured hard usage.

“Meantime the plotters in Dublin were brought to their trial, and only three of them, to wit, a country gentleman and two officers, condemned to die as traitors; which was executed upon them.<sup>6</sup> As for Mr. Lecky, a chief contriver, together with Mr. Blood, his brother-in-law, and one of his parish, being kept much more severely than the rest in a low room in the castle in bolts, he fell distracted and so continued for a while. He was sent from that to Newgate, as not being capable to be examined. Here after a while he recovered a little from his distraction, and not being noticed by his keeper, got out one night in his wife’s clothes, but was not in a capacity to dispose of himself so as to escape. He was therefore next morning apprehended, and thereafter condemned. Having been a fellow of the college of Dublin, and in great respect for a smart scholar and of a good temper, the college petitioned for his life, which was granted if he would conform. But that he refused and chose rather to die. Thereafter he was tempted by some then about court to accuse my Lord Massareene of the plot, they being jealous of my lord at that time, and thinking he knew it, being my lord's near kinsman, and upon that should have his pardon. But he abhorred treachery of that nature, and therefore was executed as the former were.<sup>7</sup> These passages I had from a credible worthy man, who had them from his own mouth a few days before he died. The rest after a while were let go, and some banished out of the kingdom.

"After the duke had settled the business concerning the plot in Dublin, he, with the advice of the council, sent orders to the ministers of the north, now at Carlingford and Carrickfergus, that either they must desert the kingdom, or go to prisons in other places of Ireland, and that within a fortnight after the order should come to their hands. The prisoners, having these orders sent them, immediately sent a petition to the duke; but this petition, though presented to the duke by the noble Massareene, their fixed old friend, had no return, but the former order must be observed.<sup>8</sup> The brethren were accordingly in a great strait what to choose. However all of them save two, Mr. Keyes and one Mr. John Cathcart [of Drumaul, <sup>7</sup> The following extracts, from the MS. in the British Museum, quoted in the preceding note, corroborate the accuracy of Adair's narrative and supply the requisite dates:—"July 5. W. Lecky sent back to the castle as being distracted. November 18, Wednesday. William Lecky, one of the late plotters, was condemned of treason in the King's Bench. The Saturday before he had made an escape out of Newgate prison in woman's apparel; but was apprehended the day following, and again committed to prison. December 12. Lecky was executed on the gallows on Oxmantown Green, near Dublin." (MS., ut supra. On his escape, it was supposed he would fly to Ulster: expresses were accordingly despatched to the north to endeavour to intercept him. The curious reader may see in the "Rawdon Papers," pp. 202, 203, how vigilantly Lord Conway, then at Lisburn, laid wait for the unfortunate prisoner.

<sup>8</sup> This harsh measure was dictated to Ormond by the King himself. Sir Henry Bennet, afterwards Lord Arlington, one of the principal secretaries of state, thus wrote to the Duke on the 4th of July:—"As for the great number of disaffected ministers your grace hath found yourself obliged to take up whilst the late plot was on foot, his or Randalstown], chose to depart the kingdom. Mr. Keyes was sent to the town of Galway and Mr. Cathcart to Athlone, where they remained prisoners a considerable time. The rest generally went to Scotland with a pass from some justice of peace in the country; and yet not without bonds and surety given not to return without leave. Those of Antrim who went were Mr. Hall, Mr. Crawford, Messrs. John and James Shaw; and of Down were Mr. Drysdale, Mr. Ramsay, and Mr. Wilson; where God provided for them to live comfortably in a private station, and found many friends beyond their expectation.

“There were divers brethren interceded for to the duke by persons of quality, to have liberty to stay in the country in a private capacity. Mr. Adair had the duke’s protection before. Mr. Robert Cunningham had a letter in his favour from my Lady Crawford Lindsay, sister to the Duke of Hamilton, and an acquaintance of the Duchess of Ormond. Mr. Gordon and Mr. Richardson had liberty of abiding in the country through procuring of my Lady Ards,<sup>9</sup> mother of the Earl Mount-Alexander, and of the Countess of Clanbrassil. Mr. Hutchinson remained by my Lord Dungannon’s intercession. Mr. Hamilton, of Killead, and Mr. James Cunningham, of Antrim, were interceded for by my Lord Massareene and his lady. Some other ministers of these two counties of Down and Antrim had been out of the country, or out of the way when majesty is of opinion you should detain in several prisons the most seditious and most dangerous of them, and let the rest go upon security of their good behaviour: the former of which cannot be taken from you to the danger of the public service if, upon demanding their habeas corpus, their prisons be changed.” And again, on the 4th of August, i.e. directs Ormond to take special care, on liberating any of the ministers, to restrain them from passing either into England or Scotland. Brown’s Mis. Aut., pp. 292—297.<sup>1</sup> The latter order probably came too late, as many ministers had retired to Scotland.

<sup>9</sup> This is the same excellent lady who is mentioned in Vol. I., p. 188, Note 10. She was now the wife of Major-General Robert Munro, who appears to have been resident at this period at or near Comber, in the county of Down. (See Montg. MSS., pp. 252, 257, 261.) In the poem of the siege of Derry, p. 33, it appears that the major-general’s brother’s son was an officer in Derry during the siege, and had the command of a regiment.

the rest were apprehended, and were now absconded. The few who were of other meetings or presbyteries had not been at this time troubled. However, the generality of the ministers of the north were at this time either banished, imprisoned, or driven into corners upon occasion of a plot which they knew nothing of, and wherein, upon the narrowest scrutiny, nothing could be found against them, except what was mentioned before of the three brethren, Messrs. Hart, Greg, and Stewart; in which these brethren, gave no grounds of disloyalty. The matter had been communicated to them in a friendly way, and they rejected it; they thus judged it had been crushed in the bud, and knew nothing of any further progress in it. And they thought it hard and scarcely consistent with candour, to accuse these men, who, had in a friendly confidence in them, represented the sad state of affairs, and desired to have them to a right channel without prejudice to the king's just authority.

“Thus the few left in the country continued as formerly, endeavouring to converse among their people to their edification as the time would bear. And it is to be observed that after the duke had narrowly searched into the carriage of the Scots in this plot, and had found them unconcerned in it, he did, as some reward of their integrity, give the people in the north indulgence not to be troubled for six months with the official [or ecclesiastical] courts in the matter of Nonconformity.<sup>10</sup> And Providence ordered that, during that time, Bramhall the primate died a sudden death,<sup>11</sup> and the bishop of Dublin, one Margetson, succeeded him: a man of a mild spirit, who to ingratiate himself with the people of these parts gave other six months' indulgence: and thereafter the judges of assize had not commission to trouble the people at the assizes for nonconformity. The bishops stormed at this begun favour to Nonconformists, and did process many to their courts upon account of nonconformity. But most got off again for money as thereafter; there being wars between the King and the state of Holland wherein he had considerable loss, and all sorts of people being much discontented, the edge of the bishops' fury was much blunted. Meantime, the few ministers in the country took every opportunity, and made use of the small advantages they had, to creep up by degrees to the exercise of their ministry, in their own congregations especially. Mr. Stewart, in the month of November after his imprisonment, having been sick in prison, and having some special friend, got liberty to return to his house upon bonds given to live amenably to the law, that is, as was by lawyers interpreted to him, only to answer the law if he thought not fit to be conformable to everything in it. Mr. Greg and Captain Moor were released in March, 1664. Thereafter the two brethren, who had chosen imprisonment in Galway and Athlone, were upon bonds released, and had liberty to return to their places. The brethren who were banished to Scotland returned by degrees; some a little sooner, some later; at first some few by intercession of friends, others came over thereafter upon their hazard, and so all were restored to their congregations, except Mr. Andrew M'Cormick and Mr. John Crookshanks,<sup>12</sup> who had been upon the plot and fled to Scotland; and not expecting or seeking for pardon in Ireland, did join thereafter with that party in Scotland which was broken at Pentland, and were there both killed.<sup>13</sup>

<sup>12</sup> Another exception ought to have been made by Adair in the case of the Rev. Michael Bruce, of Killinchy, who, though not implicated in Blood's plot, was obliged to fly to Scotland in consequence of his over-zealous proceedings already noticed; and, having been taken prisoner there and sent to London, he did not return to his congregation for above seven years. On the 23rd of June, 1664, he and Mr. Crookshanks were summoned before the Scottish council as "pretended ministers and fugitives from Ireland." (Wodrow, i., 412.) Further notices of Mr. Bruce will again occur.

<sup>13</sup> Wodrow, ii., 30—32. The battle of Pentland was fought on the 28th of November, 1666. The Presbyterians were commanded by Lieutenant-Colonel James Wallace,

These were zealous men, but walked too much in a separate way from their brethren. They meddled in matters too high for them—for had they walked with their brethren, they might have been useful in their congregations as now the rest of their brethren were; and they would not have brought any scandal of rebellion and disloyalty to the lawful magistrate, upon their profession in Ireland. Yea, Mr. M'Cormick's guilt in the plot, being immediately known after the breaking up of it, occasioned all that jealousy that was had of the rest, and much of that trouble they afterwards met with; though they were utter strangers to the actings of, and combinations with, the plotting party.<sup>14</sup>

so frequently mentioned in this volume. After this unsuccessful attempt to rescue his country from the most intolerable tyranny, both civil and religious, he fled to the Continent. ("Memoirs of Veitch," &c., pp. 361—76. See Note 23. postea.) The king's troops at Pentland were commanded by Dalzell of Binns, also noticed in the preceding pages as an officer of the Scottish army in Ulster under Major-General Monro.

<sup>14</sup> Adair subjoins the following personal notices of these ill-fated brethren. Of Mr. M'CORMICK, he says—"It is a just ground of observation that this man had not the education and learning fit for a minister. For he had been bred a tailor in a country place, and being then a great professor of religion would, after he had wife and children, go to the university to be bred in order to the ministry. This he did, and stayed for a great while, leaving his wife and children in great straits, but profited very little in learning having then all before him, as the tongues, philosophy, divinity, &c.; it was impossible his dull genius with considerable age and little time, could attain to any competency of abilities. Yet he in a short time returned as ready to pass trials, which he did, but with little satisfaction to judicious brethren, save that they looked on him as an honest man, and thought he might be useful in some remote congregation. But when settled in a congregation he competed with the brethren, and when times became confused, pretended a zeal above them all, not without reflecting on his brethren among the common people, as if they all had been but cowards. Thus he followed his own course till he fell into the snare of this plot without acquainting any of them. This," adds Adair, and I cordially repeat the same sentiment, "I have observed here not in order to leave a stain upon the name of a man who in the main was honest; but to be a warning and confirmation of the apostle's command, 'let every man abide in the same calling wherein he was called'—1 Cor. vii. 20,—and that the profession of religion, though more eminent, should not puff men up to aim at things beyond their reach. God may make use of private men in some cases when the Church is destitute of pastors; but where there is not that necessity, and where there are no extraordinary abilities in nature, education, or grace, and no learning, the attainments of such persons are hardly or very rarely followed with usefulness in the Church of God." Of Mr. CROOKSHANKS, he says:—"Resolving upon a single course of his own, he first went to France a little time before the plot of Ireland; and in Rochelle applying himself to the Protestant ministers there to see if he could get employment, they told him it was rather his duty to return to his

"The brethren about Lagan at this time had had more quiet than those of Down and Antrim upon the occasion above mentioned. But Bishop Robert Leslie, of Raphoe, son to the old Bishop Henry Leslie, of Down, who had deposed the worthy ministers before the rebellion of Ireland, envying that little ease and quiet of the ministers, summoned four of them to his court, to wit, Messrs. John Hart [Taughboyne], Thomas Drummond [Ramelton], William Semple [Letterkenny], and Adam White [Fannet.] They not answering his summons, he did at first pass the sentence of excommunication upon them; and before they could appear, he issued a writ, 'de excommunicato capiendo,' against them, and apprehended and imprisoned them without bail or mainprize. They were by the bishop appointed for the common gaol at Lifford; but through the indulgence of the sheriff, they were permitted to dwell together in a house in the town, and all their friends had access to them. They were prisoners for SIX YEARS, though they used all means possible and their friends for them, for their enlargement; and it was near the end of the year 1670 before they were released.

"They had taken various steps for this purpose. First, they petitioned the Earl of Ossory [son of the Duke of Ormond], being then deputy of Ireland in his father's absence in England in the year 1664—5; and thereafter obtained an order for enlargement but it was obstructed by the bishop of Raphoe. Secondly, they procured a 'habeas corpus' to have their business tried before the Court of King's Bench, but there they had not country and congregation, and adhere to his own people; and if suffering came, it was his duty to suffer with the people for that truth which he had preached unto them. Upon this he returned and was engaged in the plot and thereafter went to Scotland." Mr. Crookshanks was originally from Derry, where several respectable families of that name still reside. He left a son, as appears from the following entry in the minutes of the Presbytery of Lagan:—"March, 1674—5. The people of Raphoe by their letter desire the Presbytery would take care of the education of Mr. John Crookshanks' son, a hopeful youth.—The meeting appoint Mr. Hart and Mr. Campbell to speak about this matter to the relations of the young man in Derry."

relief. Thirdly, they removed their business into the Court of Chancery; but there they met with nothing but revilings from the chancellor, who was archbishop of Dublin, and their case made worse even by their being put into the sheriff's custody and sent to the gaol of Lifford, in which town they continued prisoners nearly four years. Lord Robarts in his short time [when lord-lieutenant] had dealt for them; and Sir Arthur Forbes had frequently interceded with Bishop Leslie, then his relation by marriage with his niece. But the bishop was inexorable, and upbraided the rest of the bishops for their slackness; whereas if they had taken the course he had done, the Presbyterians might easily have been crushed. All justice thus failing them in Ireland, God stirred up a person of quality to represent their case to the King. Being informed of this, they sent over a petition to his majesty for their deliverance; who, having information that they had been sufferers for him and had suffered long imprisonment only for not appearing before the bishop's court, which was contrary to their principles, and having this information from lawyers, he wrote to the lord-lieutenant and commanded their releasement, which was accordingly performed in October, 1670, after they had waited for above half a year for his answer; and had, in the meantime, been refused releasement by the primate, who had been civil to the brethren of Down, except they took the oath of supremacy.<sup>15</sup> But it is to be here observed that this Bishop Leslie, as he did inherit his father's persecuting spirit, so in these times he became a mere epicure, giving himself excessively to eating and drinking; whereupon being of a robust body, he became so fat and heavy that he could not go alone but as men supported his arms. He shortly after died suddenly and with great horror of conscience [in the year 1672.]”

During the tedious imprisonment of these brethren, so obstinately prolonged by the implacable prelate, whose unenviable notoriety as a persecutor fully equals that of his father, the affairs of the Presbyterian Church, as if in mockery of this vain attempt to effect its ruin, continued to prosper. Leslie's example was not followed by the other prelates of Ulster; and the Duke of Ormond, convinced of the loyalty and peaceableness of the Presbyterians, refrained from harassing them for nonconformity. The persecution of their brethren in Scotland being now at its height, this lenity of the Irish government was the more remarkable and providential. The movements of the Ulster Scots were indeed vigilantly observed,<sup>16</sup> and all communication with Scotland rigorously interdicted; but except the removal of their arms, they suffered no other privations from the state. The oppressions of the ecclesiastical courts and the exorbitant demands of the established clergy for tithes, constituted the principal grievances to which they were exposed. These, however, did not impede the revival of their religious worship and discipline, which the unmolested return of their ministers, after the year 1664, enabled them slowly and prudently to accomplish; so that in the course of four or five years the Presbyterian Church in Ulster had nearly recovered its former position in the province. Adair thus states the several circumstances which, under the ever-living

<sup>16</sup> See Brown's Mis. Aul., p. 429. A few persons suspected of being concerned in the tumults in Scotland, were ordered to be apprehended immediately after the battle of Pentland already noticed; I have not, however, found any mentioned by name except the following person. Lord Dungannon thus writes from Dublin, December 18, 1666, to Sir George Rawdon at Lisburn:—"By the last post I sent orders to your lieutenant for the securing and sending up hither of Major Montgomery, the horse-breeder in the county of Derry. He is one that is very troublesome and keeps a Nonconformist minister at his house, having made a convenient place for 500 auditors to meet in. This day my lord-lieutenant wished me to write to you, that if your officer had not taken him already, that he should endeavour to do it just at their preaching time, and so to take him and his preacher together, and as many priests more as should be there. Let his

Head of the Church, conspired to effect this surprising renovation, and to enable our fathers to say with the sacred historian :<sup>17</sup> "And now for a little space grace hath been showed from the Lord our God, to leave us a remnant to escape, and to give us a nail in His holy place, that our God may lighten our eyes, and give us a little reviving in our bondage, to set up the house of our God and to repair the desolations thereof!"

"Meantime the brethren, now returned and returning to their own homes, continued to be as useful as they could in their parishes, and had their private intercourse for mutual advice and strengthening one another's hands in these times. And thus, insensibly to the civil rulers, they took liberty to preach more publicly in barns, and such places in their parishes where the bulk of the people met, and did in the night administer the sacrament to them;* and by degrees they attained to such freedom, that in the year 1668 they began in divers places to build preaching-houses, and there they met publicly and performed all ordinances in a public way. They had also their monthly meetings [or presbyteries] among themselves in convenient private houses in the country, where they began to revive discipline, examining the carriage of one another, and bringing scandalous persons to acknowledgment of their scandals, in some ordinary cases before the session, and in the congregation itself, and in greater scandals before the Presbytery. In these things they, not finding present opposition, and with some eye to God's protection, made an adventure; and it pleased the Lord to bless their first essay with success. It was no compliance with bishops, nor was it any chaplain be sent to the county jail, and himself sent hither as the first order directed." ("Rawdon Papers," p. 222.) It appears from the "Essex State Letters," p. 12, that the major was suspected of having been at Pentland, and that he was not arrested at this period.

application to the court at this time which tended to any liberty they had; but the observable providence of God who made the following divers things to concur in it.

“First, the edge of the magistrates’ fury had been much blunted in their former causeless oppressing of the ministers, especially on occasion of that plot before mentioned. Secondly, they had found the ministers’ loyalty when they had searched to the bottom. Thirdly, they now began to see that what the ministers did was from conscience, for God helped them to go about their work peaceably and painfully under divers disadvantages. They had the jealous eye of the magistrate over them; the envious eye of the clergy, so called, watching for their halting; the people generally, for seven years together after their first ejection, forsaking the ministers as to their maintenance, even when they were living among them and doing what they could for them; only it is not to be denied they had the people’s affectionate respect, and some small accidental kindnesses from some particular persons, which however amounted to very little as to the support of their families. The people too were convinced of the ministers’ constancy; under a variety of times, troubles, and sufferings, they were the same; and the Lord helped them to some liveliness in preaching, and the people to some hunger in hearing the Word, after this little beginning of a life from the dead. These things made the people adhere, so far as was possible, to their ministers, and attend the ordinances administered by them at the times and places that were appointed.

“Again, the present legal Churchmen became more and more distasteful to the people of all sorts. Men of estates found their tenants oppressed, impoverished, and rendered unable to pay their rents, through the covetousness and draining of the superior clergy by their rents and tithes; but especially by the official courts which were a heavy plague upon the people through their cruelty and unreasonable exactions for nonconformity, arbitrarily governing all; their lust, covetousness, and power being their only rule, especially where they knew anything was to be had. This disgusted the people and made them cling more affectionately to the painful and laborious ministers of the Presbyterian persuasion, who had now attained to considerable countenance in the country. But there was like to be an interruption. For there was an information sent to the Lord Ossory, when lord-deputy in his father's absence, from some unfriends in the north, that the ministers were setting up their presbyteries as openly as ever, and that they were renewing the Solemn League and Covenant among the people. Upon which he called Sir Arthur Forbes, and bid him try if these informations were true, not without threatenings if it proved so. Sir Arthur caused a Scotch gentleman, who had special acquaintance with some of the number to write and signify to them that there were such informations given. This a brother immediately answered, shewing that these informations were false, which satisfied the Lord Ossory."

Owing to these causes, therefore, at the beginning of the year 1669, the Presbyterian Church in Ulster had attained to considerable freedom. Presbyteries were again organised, though it was necessary to hold their meetings in private houses, and to dispense with the attendance of ruling-elders; parishes, whose ministers had died or removed, were regularly visited by members of Presbytery, and public worship resumed; houses were erected in several places for the accommodation of those who refused to frequent their parish churches, now either exclusively occupied by the Episcopalian clergy, or else so ruined as to be unfit for use;<sup>18</sup> the ordinances of the Gospel were administered publicly to crowded congregations, unmolested by the civil power; considerable thirst for knowledge and zeal for religion pervaded the people, mingled with increasing alienation from the indolent or rapacious ministers of the establishment; and sessions and Presbyteries began once more to exercise the discipline of the Church upon offenders. The only department of duty which they were as yet doubtful about resuming, was that pertaining to the ordination of ministers. The power of ordination was exclusively vested by law in the legal bishops, who, as might be expected, were especially jealous of any attempt to invade their prerogative. It was accordingly with the utmost circumspection that the brethren ventured, as they soon did, to license or ordain, or to hold meetings for the exercise of ecclesiastical jurisdiction.

<sup>18</sup> The state of the parish churches throughout the rural parts of Ulster may be inferred from the following curious extracts from a Representation to the London Companies made in 1670 by Dr. Mossom, bishop of Derry, in order to procure assistance from their funds. The bishop went over to London in that year, and, having petitioned the King in council for a recommendation of his case to the Irish Society, which was

In all respects, therefore, the state of the Church was most promising. "It is a matter of rejoicing," writes one of the ministers of Ulster, in April, 1669, to a friend in Scotland, "that the Lord's work seems to be reviving here [in Ireland].

granted on the 15th of May, he laid before them a "Representation of the present state of the city and county of Londonderry, in several great concerns thereof," which I found among the MSS. in the British Museum, and from which I made the following extracts:—"1. The churches, especially, those within the twelve London proportions, are generally ruinous, and not one, except that within the city, is in repair and accommodation fit for God's worship; neither are the inhabitants, such is their extreme poverty, any ways able to rebuild or repair them: So that the holy offices of God's public worship are, for the most part, administered either in a dirty cabin or in a common ale-house. 3. Not only the churches are ruinous, but also the ministers are generally and necessarily non-resident, not having any houses upon their cures, nor being able, through meanness of estate and numberlessness of their families, to build themselves houses, nor can they find habitation to be hired upon the place. 4. The country is generally so impoverished through want of trade that the tenants cannot pay their rents; no, not when harassed by taking distresses, and much land hath been laid waste of late and more is daily so, which threateneth an undoing to the country." The bishop then subjoins certain "Proposals" for remedying these evils. For the repair of the churches, each company were to contribute one with another £40, and a like sum by the bishop and the tenants of each parish; and, for the encouragement of trade, it was proposed to settle a bank at Derry, with a capital of £3,000 or £4,000, one-half to be advanced by the society, and the other half by persons of quality and estate in the city and county. (See Donat. MSS., No. 4,763, fol. 508, et seq.) I am unable to say whether these proposals were ever adopted.

Christ hath a Church here that appears with the fairest face, and the cleanest garments ; and has proven most faithful with God of any of the three [national churches], and really hath much of the light of His countenance. The sun seems to be fairly risen on this land ; whether it may be soon overclouded I cannot say, but Presbyterians' liberty is in many places little less than when they had law for them. They are settling their ministers with encouragement, and building public houses of worship for their meetings, and providing vacancies with ministers. About a month ago I had occasion to be at Dublin, where the sacrament of the Lord's Supper was administrate publickly on the Lord's-day, at the ordinary time, and some hundreds standing without, the doors and windows of a throng meeting-house being cast open ; a public fast on the Thursday, two sermons on Saturday, and as many on Monday. To all this I was a witness and more than a witness. The harvest is great, the burden-bearers are few, and the few are not idle."<sup>19</sup>

"After a while," continues Adair, "in September, 1669, Lord Robarts came over lord-lieutenant [in room of the Duke of Ormond]. He was represented as a person of great worth for wisdom, learning, strictness in his commands, and severity against vice, no enemy to godly people, yet somewhat morose in his temper and carriage."<sup>20</sup> This representation of him he answered in his practice during the short time of his government. He was a public discountenancer of all vice. The public players he stopped there, as well as other vicious persons. He was strict and peremptory upon the officers in the army,

especially in two things; first, that they were forced to keep close to their quarters and garrisons where their soldiers were; and secondly, that they were put to pay the poor soldiers exactly, whereas before they had used to recede where they pleased, and to spend much of the soldiers' pay upon their own extravagancies. He had his reflections sometimes upon the bishops, and particularly upon him of Dublin, who was also chancellor of Ireland, on account of the unmanageable charge he took upon him.

“As to the Nonconformists, though his own practice was always after the episcopal forms of worship, yet he nothing disappointed their good hopes of him. For in his little time those in the north grew yet more confident and encouraged; and those in Dublin rather grew in the begun liberty they had under the Earl of Ossory. The chancellor dealt with him to suppress the meeting there; but he told him if they were not Papists, and were peaceable and civil, he had no commission to meddle with them. The brethren in the north, beginning to understand these passages, not only went on in their ministry without fear, but begun to think of licensing young men to preach, and recommending them to such congregations where none of their number were. But the Lord Roberts' government was soon shortened. He came in September, and returned to England in the April following [1670]. The occasion of this was the temper of the soldiery, and persons of quality in this time could not bear severity against vice. All degrees of that sort of people desired to be rid of the yoke, and from under such a severe governor. Many suggestions and complaints were sent over against him. He found he had many enemies in Ireland, and thought in his absence he might be clouded at court. Whereupon he wrote to the King desiring to demit his office, which the King, by persuasion of some about him, did immediately grant, and chose another, one Lord Berkeley, in his room. Those who loved Lord Roberts' government, blamed him for so suddenly giving it up, seeing there were no just grounds of accusation against his government, but that he could not comply with the debauched temper of the time and place he came to. Many things worthy of a noble judge appeared in him. The King had a good respect for him, as being one in England who, during his majesty's exile, did very largely and yearly send supply to him. However, the short time of his government in Ireland gave a dash to open profaneness, and some encouragement to the lovers of truth.

"There were brethren, and a little after this time divers preachers came from Scotland, who called the people in the country to more public assembling together in the fields, and otherwise than the ministers of the country judged expedient in that time.<sup>21</sup> The country ministers thought it more conducive to their work to be doing somewhat among the people in a more private way as the times could bear, than expose themselves and the people both to present sufferings and being deprived of their present liberty, through more public appearances. Among other things they resolved to hold a general meeting of the brethren, by means of a few deputed from each meeting or presbytery, to consult as a COMMITTEE for the welfare of the whole, and to recommend to the various meetings such steps as their present exigencies demanded. This meeting of a committee was in a time when ministers and people wanted not their grounds of fear that new troubles might arise; for the parliament of England had made severe acts against the meetings of Nonconformists,<sup>22</sup> and the parliament of Scotland was no better disposed toward them. The Lord Berkley, now come from England to be chief governor in Ireland, was a man who had no repute for love to religion nor a good temper, bred a courtier, and little favour expected from him.

<sup>21</sup> Among these, the most forward was the well-known Alexander Peden, who frequently visited Ulster during this period of the Church's peace, collecting multitudes and preaching to them in public places; because the resident ministers of the presbytery would not countenance his indiscreet braving of the law, for which there was not the same necessity as in Scotland—there being full liberty here, without any bonds or other sinful compliance with government, to preach in the meeting-houses—he denounced the heaviest judgments upon them as time-servers, and cowardly betrayers of the interests of the truth. These furious and unmerited revilings, as might be expected, alienated from him the ministers in Ulster, who were otherwise disposed to sympathise with him in his privations, and led to an open breach between him and them. His first visit to Ulster appears to have been in this year. See the "Biographia Presbyteriana," containing the complete edition of his life. Edin., 1827, vol. i., p. 102.

“However, the brethren being met [in committee], went about what was incumbent to them, viz., only to relate the mind of their respective meetings as to such questions or cases as were stated before them, or had been given them in commission to answer; and withal to propose overtures to their several meetings to be considered by them, and their answers to be communicated to the rest of their meetings at their first ‘sederunt’ if necessity required, or at farthest, to the next committee, and by their brethren there to their meetings. First, there had been overtures agreed unto by the meetings of Down and Antrim for managing the work of ordination* at that time in as

<sup>22</sup> These acts were—one in 1664 (16 Car. II., c. 4), called THE CONVENTICLE ACT, inflicting severe penalties on every person above the age of sixteen, convicted before a single magistrate for attending any religious meeting not conformable to the established Church, at which five or more persons than those belonging to the household should be present. The other in 1665 (17 Car. II., c. 2), called the FIVE-MILE ACT, “the last step in the climax of intolerance,” forbidding all nonconforming ministers, refusing to take the oath of passive obedience and non-resistance, to reside within five miles of any city, borough, or corporate town, or any place where they had previously officiated. This infamous statute, as Hallam justly characterises it, passed the commons without a division, but was opposed though carried in the lords. “To quit the towns,” says that eminent writer, “where they had long been connected, and where alone they had friends and disciples, for a residence in country villages, was an exclusion from the ordinary means of subsistence. The Church of England had doubtless her provocations, but she made the retaliation much more than commensurate to the injury. No severity comparable to this cold-blooded persecution had been inflicted by the late powers, even in the ferment and fury of a civil war.”—Hallam’s “Const. Hist.,” ii., 213.

[* “By performing the act of ordination, the ministers exposed themselves to heavy penalties; and the bishops were especially watchful as to this point, hoping thus to cut off the supply of Presbyterian pastors. In 1673, Patrick Shaw, who had received a unanimous call from the congregation of Carnmoney, was ordained privately at Larne. In 1672, John Haltridge, who had received a call to Islandmagee, was ordained at Ballycarry. In 1674, Robert Henry, who had received a call to Carrickfergus, was prudential a way as the time would permit; these were to be recommended to the consideration of the rest. Secondly, it was found to be the judgment of the presbyteries generally, that the baptism by private deceivers and intruders without ordination, should be declared no baptism, and the children should be baptised by the ministers of the Gospel. Yet withal it was thought fit that before they were baptised, the brethren should have the joint advice of the gravest ministers in Scotland, and for that end letters should be written to some of them to return their own and their brethren's answers; which accordingly was done, and their answer returned agreed with the judgment of the brethren in Ireland in that particular. Thirdly, a collection was proposed among the presbyteries and their congregations for supply of the ministers of Scotland banished for their non-compliance with some sinful injunctions of the parliament of Scotland, and who were now sojourners in Holland. This was accordingly performed with great alacrity by the people, and the collection of one hundred and twenty pounds sterling transmitted to them, and their thanks returned to the brethren in Ireland.<sup>23</sup> Fourthly, it was then overtured that the synod's act [passed before the Restoration] anent reviewing the [general] presbytery's book should be put in practice; but most of these books were lost through the tossings and distemper of an honest worthy brother, Mr. Thomas Peebles, clerk to the synod. Fifthly it was over-ordained at Mr. John Crawford's house, near Ballynure."—Adair's Narrative, p. 293, note.]

<sup>23</sup> Among these banished ministers were the Rev. John Brown of Wamphray, Robert M'Ward and John Carstares, both of Glasgow, Robert Trail, of Edinburgh, James Simpson, of Airth, who had been chaplain to the Lord Sinclair's regiment in Newry in 1642, and the venerable John Livingston, formerly of Killinchy, who died at Rotterdam, August 9, 1672. Colonel James Wallace also lived at this period at Rotterdam, and in 1676—78 officiated as elder in the Scots Church there. ("Steven's Hist.," p. 42.) He doubtless shared in the benevolent contribution from the Church in Ulster, of which, for several years, he had been one of the most zealous elders. He also died at Rotterdam in the end of the year 1678. This generous donation of the Ulster Presbyterians to their exiled Scottish brethren has not been noticed by any previous writer.

tured that Mr. Greg should endeavour the composing a history of the beginning and progress of the Gospel in these parts, as the synod had appointed him.<sup>24</sup> Sixthly, a public fast was proposed partly because of the new governor, Lord Berkley, from whom trouble to the Church was feared and partly for the unseasonableness of the weather. This was accordingly kept the third Tuesday of the month [of May] and with such countenance from God and presence in the congregations of the people, that even those who were but unfriends and coming to observe were convinced. And besides the Lord visibly answered prayer by a remarkable change of the season immediately after; so that the people, where Presbyterians, were least entertained, and where the people were otherwise principled, as in Lecale [in the county of Down] found the benefit of seasonable rain after a dangerous and scorching drought, which had come upon unseasonable and excessive rains before: so that these people thanked God that, since none would pray, the Presbyterians prayed and fasted, and had obtained rain and a good season.

“Immediately after these things, a storm threatened the ministers particularly, which began at the brethren of Down. The occasion whereof was specially the envy that the clergy had conceived at the begun liberty of the ministers and their public congregations and meetings among themselves. They had risen up from their graves twice: first, being dead by the law as to their ministry, immediately after the bishops appeared in the country. They began a little after to creep out again, which when they were beginning to do shortly after, through occasion of the plot they were put in a worse case than before, being imprisoned, banished, and driven into corners. Now they were up again under the bishops' eye exercising their ministry, and the whole country flocking to them and deserting the legal incumbents. The clergy fretted, but yet did not know how to help it. The ministers were not restrained by the magistrate; they were loved and esteemed by the whole country, and had a respect even from sober persons of the bishops' persuasion beyond their own clergy. Though these things a little restrained their violence, yet they increased their envy and indignation. Besides, the people of the country generally neglected and slighted the curates in their burials, baptisms, &c., and when curates would officiously urge their service at burials, they were refused or resisted, which the chancellor himself, who was also archdeacon, had lately met with at a burial; who, when he would have read over the corpse of a person in burying, was resisted by a kinsman of his, a mean countryman, which did animate him and he vowed revenge. Beside, the late fast, and the country's so generally owning that solemnity, and the visible fruit of it, did gail the prelatical clergy. They saw these things weakening their party and strengthening the ministry of these poor men, and engaging the whole country to them; and yet they were ashamed palpably to condemn such things.

"But that which did more immediately occasion this threatened trouble was Bishop Robert Leslie, of Raphoe. He had by this time kept four worthy brethren nearly six years in prison, as before related. He, coming to these parts of the county of Down about his other occasions, did visit the bishop of Down, one Boyle,<sup>25</sup> and did so stir him up against the ministers, and upbraid him for his negligence and want of zeal in not using the key of jurisdiction, that this bishop resolved to play the man in his dioceses, and even to a greater length than Leslie had done in Raphoe diocese. For whereas Leslie had persecuted but four, Boyle presently sent summonses to twelve brethren of Down to appear before his court, which he knew they would not do, and therefore resolved suddenly to go on to excommunication. Their names were Masters John Drysdale, John Greg, Andrew Stewart, Gilbert Ramsay, William Richardson, James Gordon, Henry Livingston, Alexander Hutchinson, Hugh Wilson, William Reid, Michael Bruce, who had but newly returned to his parish after great troubles and long imprisonment in Scotland and England,<sup>26</sup> and Mr. Gilbert Kennedy, a Scotch minister, who had settled for a time in a country parish.<sup>27</sup> The first summons none of these ministers received, yet they were upon them called at the next court and noted contumacious. The second summons was sent and left at their houses, and con-

of his age, and was buried at Dromore. He was succeeded in Down and Connor by Dr. Roger Boyle, who, in 1672, was translated to Clogher, where he succeeded Robert Leslie, the hereditary foe of the Presbyterians, who had been translated in 1671 from Raphoe to Clogher, where he lived only a year.

<sup>26</sup> After many escapes in Scotland, Mr. Bruce was taken prisoner near Stirling in June, 1668, and in July following was sentenced by the Scottish council to be banished out of the three kingdoms. In September he was sent by sea to London to await his majesty's pleasure, and confined in the Gatehouse, Westminster, where he was shortly afterwards condemned to go to Tangier, in Africa. (Wodrow, ii., 111.) His wife followed him to London; when there, she found means to interest some of the courtiers in his favour, and Charles, unwilling formally to reverse the sentence of banishment, was prevailed on to give him the privilege of naming the place of his exile. Mr. Bruce, it is said, immediately chose "Killinchy Woods," a writ of nolo prosequi was obtained for him, and in April 1670 he once more settled in his favourite parish of Killinchy. [Mr. Bruce has been described as a man of great genius and of a liberal education—much given to meditation and secret prayer—"a thundering, broken-hearted, and most affecting preacher." He died, after the Revolution, in Scotland, in 1693.]

<sup>27</sup> In 1662, the Rev. Gilbert Kennedy, who had been ordained as minister of Girvan, in Ayrshire, in 1651, was ejected from that parish, and came to Ireland about 1668. He settled in Dundonald after the death of Mr. Peebles, and died in that charge, February 6, 1687—88. He was brother to the Rev. Thomas Kennedy, of Donoughmore and Carlan, in Tyrone, and grandfather to the Rev. Gilbert Kennedy, minister successively of Lisburn, Killileagh, and Belfast, who died in 1773.

trary to their usual custom of meeting only monthly, the next court was appointed within a fortnight, that he might sooner win to the sentence of excommunication against them, and thereafter proceed to the ministers of the next county, the other diocese of Connor.

“The brethren of Down, after meeting and consultation in this case, resolved to send one of their number with a supplication to the lord-lieutenant, and to make use of what friends in Dublin they could. But they judged it fit in the first place to sound the bishop, if any abatement of such severity might be expected from him; the rather that he had since his coming into the country carried quietly, they thought they might inquire the ground of this sudden alteration. Accordingly, on the 30th of June, Mr. Drysdale and Mr. Hutchinson were sent to the bishop, but with this further instruction, that if they found not good ground of hope from the bishop, Mr. Drysdale should immediately repair from him to Dublin. They came to Hillsborough, where the bishop had his house at that time. They having sent to him, shewing they were waiting to speak with him, he, in a great fury and disdain, returned answer, he would not speak with them but in open court on the morrow. Yet thereafter, upon the archdeacon suggesting to him it would be evil looked on not to hear what the ministers had to say to him, the brethren were again sent for, and being come to him they found nothing but railing language, calling them all rebels from the beginning, and that they had seduced the people. He said, though he had little hope to do good to the seduced people, yet he resolved to execute the law against them. Thus after some discourse by these brethren unto him, defending their carriage with truth and soberness, they left him, and Mr. Drysdale, according to appointment, went forward to Dublin to make application to the lord-lieutenant. But before this, a letter having been written to Sir Arthur Forbes, informing him of the case, he went to the lord-lieutenant, and was by him recommended to the Primate Margetson to relate the case to him.<sup>28</sup> Sir Arthur knowing the loyalty and sufferings of the ministers of the north from the beginning upon the King's account, and being not only of unquestionable loyalty himself, and a great actor and sufferer for the King before, but also in high favour with his majesty, and a privy-counsellor and chief commander in the army, he did prevail with the primate, and the Chancellor Boyle, then archbishop of Dublin, that a letter should be written to the bishop of Down to forbear any further prosecuting that business against these ministers till the 10th of August following; at which time the primate himself would be in the north, being the year of his triennial visitation. This letter being written did force the bishop of Down to desist against his will; for that being the archbishop's year of visitation, inferior bishops were not to meddle with jurisdiction but by his appointment. This letter came before Mr. Drysdale reached Dublin. However, being there he went to the primate and informed him of the case, who only inquired whether the ministers had exercised the power of jurisdiction and ordination, the two things proper to the bishop. Mr. Drysdale told him there had been nothing of that hitherto, as indeed the brethren were but upon a way to it. The bishop said, if he came to the north, he would do as he saw cause. Thus were the brethren and people of their charge left in suspense as to any determination of their cause; their adversaries looking to the bishop and his authority for restraining their liberty, and themselves looking to God for a merciful event.

"Meantime, two worthy brethren were removed out of this life. Mr. John Greg was buried July the 22nd, and Mr. Richardson, having been at his burial, took immediately a fever and was buried that day week, the 29th of July. They were two of the ablest and most useful men among the whole number. Mr. James Cunningham, of Antrim, had died a while before—a prudent, godly man ; and Mr. Thomas Crawford a while after him [in December]—an able and sincere minister of Christ. Mr. James Shaw, a zealous worthy preacher, was laid by through sickness and a strange afflicting trouble coming on his family after the death of his wife.<sup>29</sup> Mr. Gilbert Ramsay, too, having taken a palsy within a short time thereafter, and the little remainder of his strength and spirits decaying, he died : he was a true Nathaniel

<sup>28</sup> Sir Arthur Forbes became the principal patron of the Presbyterians after the decease of their great friend, the Lord Massareene, who died at Antrim in September 1665. Frequent references will be subsequently made to this upright and indefatigable statesman, who was afterwards created Earl of Granard.

<sup>29</sup> As an illustration of the character of those times, I subjoin Adair's account of the "strange afflicting trouble" noticed in the text :—"There had been great ground of jealousy that Mr. Shaw's wife in her childbed had been wronged by sorcery of some witches in the parish. After her death a considerable time some spirit or spirits troubled the house by casting stones down at the chimney, appearing to the servants, and especially having got one of them, a young man, to keep appointed times and places wherein it appeared in divers shapes and spake audibly to him. The people of the parish watched the house while Mr. Shaw at this time lay sick in his bed ; and indeed did not wholly recover, but within a while died, it was thought, not without the art of sorcery ; though otherwise he was not only valetudinary but broken with melancholy"—causes sufficient, one would think, to account for his death without the "art of sorcery." I may add that, in September, 1672, the young man alluded to by Adair appeared before the Presbytery, and the following is the entry of their proceedings in this curious case :—"Mr. James Shaw having recommended to this meeting one George Russel, a servant of his, who had conferred with that spirit that troubled Mr. James Shaw's house, that the brethren might speak to the said George : he being called compeared, and confessed his conversing and conferring with that spirit which appeared to him, and his keeping tryst with it, and obeying it by drawing circles and other circumstances at the demand and direction of the said spirit. The brethren finding in this carriage of the boy much ignorance and a bold confidence, and finding the hazard he was in by the said spirit, they laboured to make him sensible of his sinful carriage, warned him of his danger, and recommended him to study knowledge and to pray, and discharged him to converse any such way in time coming with the said spirit under what pretences soever, which he promised ; and the brethren did resolve to deal further with him afterwards to bring him to more sense of his sin and danger." This "confident" lad was very probably an accomplice in the imposition which must have been practised on the family of this worthy but hypochondriac minister. Mr. Shaw died at Carrmoney in December, 1672. The subject of the supposed appearance of spirits, &c., had previously occupied a good deal of the public attention in the neighbourhood of Belfast. In 1662, a noted case of this kind occurred at Drumbridge, between Belfast and Lisburn, which excited the curiosity of Jeremy Taylor ; and the bishop's own herd at Portmore, beside Lough Neagh, was also a notable ghost-seer. See More's "Glanville's Sadducismus Triumphatus" (pp. 382—90), "that strange work," says Bishop Heber, in his "Life of Jeremy Taylor," "which (though its ravenous credulity and ghostly frontispieces may, at present, be thought only proper to alarm a nursery) displays in some of its arguments much of that of good abilities, sent over to Bangor by famous Mr. Blair, and deceived not his expectation. And shortly after died also Mr. Thomas Peebles, a man learned and faithful, and eminent in the languages and history.<sup>30</sup>

"These were sad troubles to the poor afflicted ministers, to have some of the choicest of their brethren taken from them by death, and their enemies raging against them. But they were not forsaken by their great Master; he supported their spirits, and followed them with remarkable and seasonable providences. On the day of Mr. Richardson's burial, there was a meeting appointed at Mr. Stewart's house [near Donaghadee], who had been also unwell and unable to travel; and there they begun to enter on trial three young men, viz., Mr. John Cunningham, in reference to the parish of Donacloney, Mr. William Legat, and Mr. George Montgomery, in order to singular platonic learning by which its author and editor were distinguished, and has, undoubtedly, adduced some evidences of apparitions which it is easier to ridicule than to disprove."

<sup>31</sup> To Adair's sad list of deaths must be added that of the Rev. Andrew Stewart, of Donaghadee, who died on the 2nd of January, 1671, in the forty-sixth year of his age. On his tombstone are the following quaintly constructed lines :—

"Vita probum, probitasque pium, pietasque beatum, Laus celebrem, laudi mens dedit esse parem.
Corpus humum, mens Diapolum, fama inclyta mundum, Morte subit, decorat lumine, laude beat."

The learned reader will be amused with another specimen of this whimsical and involved style, which I extract from that curious volume, well described in the Quarterly Review (x., 113), as one of the most singular books in this or in any other language. Its puns and its poems, its sermons and its anagrams, render it unique in its kind"—I mean "Mather's New England." The following is Mather's epitaph (book iii., p. 101) on Mr. Henry Dunster, for some time president of Harvard College :—

"Præco, pater, servus ; sonui, fovi, coluique ;
Sacra, scholam, Christum ; voce, rigore, fide.
Famam, animam, corpus ; dispergit, recreat, abdit ;
Virtus, Christus, humus ; laude, salute, sinu."

The following lines are found in a MS. in Trinity College, Cambridge (O. 2, 45, fol. 10), quoted by Wright in his "Essays on the Middle Ages," vol. i., p. 200 :—

"Miles, Venator, mercator, navita, princeps, Debellat, sequitur, redimit, percurrit, egestat,
Prædones, lepores, merces, spumantia, mentem,
Cuspide, fervore, numismate, flamine, rebus,

license them to preach. They also appointed a private fast, to deal with God for the continuance of their liberty and preventing the fury of the bishops, to be held on the 16th of August. The Lord was pleased to hear their prayer. For, first, the lord-lieutenant had advised the primate to moderation toward ministers; secondly, the primate himself was not of a persecuting temper, but rather inclinable to engage the country and to increase his estate; thirdly, his letter to the bishop of Down was not well enough received by him, the bishop saying that the primate had wronged him in taking upon him to hinder the exercise of his authority in his own diocese, and comparing himself in learning and fitness to govern with the primate. Whereupon a sharp contention fell out between them; but the primate, understanding his own superiority, did the rather own it in this matter, being engaged in it, and alleging the bishop of Down had brought him to needless trouble without his own advice. When the brethren sent to him to know what they might expect as to their process, he returned answer that those gentlemen, for so he called them, needed not fear a surprisal in that matter in haste: and thus the process ended as to the brethren of Down; and the bishop with his clergy there, found that his intentions against the ministers of Antrim were prevented.

“This mercy came seasonably to this poor Church in divers respects. It proved a continuation of the ministers’ liberty and a confirmation of it; a dash, too, to those of the prelates who were more violent, and that by their own primate of Ireland. It was some evidence and fruit of the King’s clemency and favour to the Presbyterian ministers of the north of Ireland; and also an evidence of the moderation of the lord-lieutenant, Berkley, and that he was no enemy to these ministers. And further it fell in mercifully, being after and about the time of the deaths of divers useful and worthy brethren, which otherwise in itself was a bad presage to this Church.

Yet the gracious God made up that loss divers ways; partly by providing young men whom, by degrees, the brethren ordained and planted in congregations, and partly by sending divers able and worthy ministers from Scotland who settled in this Church for a time.<sup>31</sup> And all this was the more remarkable that it was in the time when nonconformity, both in England and Scotland, was much discountenanced, not only by severe acts of parliament, whereby in England five persons might not meet together for worship otherwise than the law prescribed; and in Scotland not so much as family worship must be performed, if there were but one person more than the family itself present. And both in England and Scotland meetings of Nonconformists, called conventicles, were most strictly pursued and suppressed. Many, both ministers and godly people, were put to great sufferings both then and divers years after, only because they could not comply with the prelates, their curates, or their courses, but would worship God with their own ministers, or with other godly ministers of their own sentiments. And though they did all in a private way, and shunned as much as possible to give offence to the magistrate; yet their privacy did not save them from violence, especially in Scotland, where the great work which engaged the King's council there and the forces they had in the country for many years was, to find out these meetings, to apprehend the ministers, and other persons, and then to pass sentence of banishment, fining, and imprisonment upon them; whereupon many sad consequences followed which it is not pertinent here to relate, only to observe God's dealing with His poor Church in the north of Ireland, the most unlikely to obtain any favour of this kind. They were not only opposite in their principles and practices to the prelatic way, as others of their persuasion in the other two kingdoms; but they were in a manner strangers in another country, being of the Scotch extraction, and on both these accounts being hated and despised by those of the English who were prelatical. They generally were of an humble extraction and sort of people, yet Providence ordered their liberty and quiet when others, more deserving and who had greater ground of expectation, were deprived of it. Thus the ministers with the people, having by the wonderful providence of God an open door given them, continued in the exercise of their ministry; and their assemblies daily grew so that within a while every congregation erected a house for their meeting together, and began to celebrate the sacrament in their public assemblies.

<sup>31</sup> Out of a number of ministers in Galloway expatriated by the Scottish council (Wodrow, i., 362), no less than six settled about this time in the Presbytery of Down, and obtained a favourable asylum here—viz., the Rev. Archibald Hamilton, of Wigton, succeeded Mr. Ramsay at Bangor; the Rev. Thomas Kennedy, of Leswalt, near Stranraer, succeeded Mr. Greg at Newtownards; the Rev. Alexander Ferguson, of Sorbie, succeeded Mr. Richardson, of Killilnagh; and the Rev. Patrick Peacock, of Kirkmabreck, not far from Wigton, the Rev. George Waugh, of Kirkinner, of the Presbytery of Wigton, and the Rev. John M'Broom, of Portpatrick, were also settled in Down in 1679, and for some years previously. I have not been able to ascertain in what congregations these three ministers were respectively settled, but they must have been Donaghadee, Portaferry, and Clough,* as all the other principal congregations had ministers at this period. Several other eminent Scottish ministers removed to Ulster about this time. In 1672, the Rev. Robert Rule (brother to the celebrated Dr. Gilbert Rule), who had been ejected from Stirling in 1662, became minister of the Presbyterian Church in Derry, where he officiated till the year 1688, when he returned to Scotland.† In 1670, the Rev. Thomas Wylie, who had been ejected from Kirkcudbright, came over to Coleraine, where several of his relatives appear to have resided. He officiated as minister of that congregation for nearly three years, when he also returned to Scotland, and settled at Fenwick, under the Act of Indulgence, where he died July 20, 1676. On his leaving Coleraine, in the end of June, 1673, the congregation entrusted him with a blank call to present, in their name, to any suitable minister he could procure for them. A copy of this call is in my possession. Among the subscribers are three persons of the name of Wylie, three of the name of Galt, with the names of about thirty others. The Rev. William Weir, who had been ejected from Linlithgow, accepted this call, and officiated at Coleraine from 1674 to 1687, when he again settled in his former charge in Scotland, where he died in July, 1695.

[* Mr. M'Broom was minister of Annahilt. His tombstone is still to be seen in the Annahilt graveyard. According to it, he died July 7, 1652, after a ministry of twenty years.]

“Meantime there fell out a passage in Dublin at Christmas in this year, which, though not properly belonging to the history of the north of Ireland, yet, relating to Presbyterians, is not unworthy to be recorded. There had been a while before building at Dublin a large stately house, with three stories of galleries, for acting the stage-plays, at the cost and free-will offering of noblemen and other persons of quality, unto which the bishops contributed largely, though at the time they refused to give countenance or assistance for building a church at Dame's Street, where there was great need through the multiplying of the inhabitants in that city, much above what could be contained in the churches formerly built, especially in that place of the city. To this house came a great number of noblemen and ladies, beside other persons and clergymen, on the first day of Christmas being Monday [the 26th of December]. The play acted was one called by them 'The Nonconformist.' And there among other parts of the play the poor shadow of a Nonconformist minister is mocked and upbraided, and at last is brought to the stocks, prepared for this purpose, that his legs may be fastened. Those of the greatest quality sat lowest, those next in quality sat the next above, and the common people in the upmost gallery. But behold, when this shadow is brought to the stocks, as an affront upon Presbyterian ministers, and to teach great persons to deal with like severity towards them, down came the upper gallery on the middle one where gentlemen and others sat, and that gallery broke too, and much of it fell down on the lords and ladies. Divers were killed and many hurt.<sup>32</sup> Among those that were hurt was one of the lord-lieutenant's sons, and the Lady Clanbrassil who, the year before, had caused to be pulled down the preaching-house at Bangor. Such providences so circumstantial in divers respects will not pass without observation of impartial and prudent persons, for surely they have a language if men would hear."<sup>33</sup>

<sup>33</sup> With this anecdote, Adair's MS., of which I have latterly made so much use, unfortunately terminates. Of this MS. and its author I have already given a brief account in the note at page 208 of the First Volume of this history. I may here add, that, for a

Lord Berkley, the lord-lieutenant, having occasion to visit England, the lord-chancellor and Sir Arthur Forbes were appointed lords-justices, and sworn into office on the 12th of June, 1671. Sir Arthur, the steady and indefatigable friend of the Presbyterians, embraced this opportunity of obtaining an order for the liberation of those who had been imprisoned on account of their nonconformity. Among the persons released pursuant to this order was one John Goodall, a native of Scotland, and by trade a wheelwright, who, with his wife, had settled in the city of Armagh a short time prior to the Restoration. After that event he was for a while unmolested, though he continued to bear a faithful testimony against Prelacy, and refused to conform even in the slightest particular that might imply an approbation of the established worship. At length the ire of the clergy being specially excited by the heinous misdemeanour of working on Christmas-day, a warrant was hastily procured from Dublin, and he was committed to prison in the beginning of the year 1668. He was confined, though with no great rigour, for more than three years, till released by the interference of Sir Arthur Forbes. A few years afterwards, he returned with his family to his native length of time, it was believed no copy of this valuable manuscript existed; and during the year 1764, the following advertisement was inserted for a considerable period in the Belfast News-Letter:—"Whereas a manuscript of Mr. Patrick Adair, formerly dissenting minister in Belfast, which manuscript was for some time in the possession of Mr. Thomas Brown, of Glenarm, and afterwards of Mr. Clotworthy Brown, his brother, giving some historical account of the first settlement of Presbyterian Congregations and Ministers in the North of Ireland, cannot now be found. Notice is hereby given, that whoever will give any information of the said manuscript to Messrs. John Hay and James Magee, booksellers in Belfast, so as it may be found, shall be liberally rewarded." At length, about the year 1810, the late Dr. S. M. Stephenson, of Belfast, as he informed me in 1823, discovered the present copy among the papers of the late W. Trail Kennedy, Esq., of Annadale, near Belfast, who gave it to the doctor, and by him it was presented to the Public Presbyterial Library, which is at present claimed and held by the Antrim Presbytery as their exclusive property. The reader of these volumes has perused all the important portions of this unpublished, and, hitherto, almost unknown manuscript. kingdom, where he lived till after the Revolution. His wife survived him, and, dying at Leith, left a memoir of her life, including an account of their residence at Armagh, which has been fortunately preserved,<sup>34</sup> and which presents a graphic sketch of the annoyances and privations to which even the humblest Presbyterians were at this time subjected.

The Church was exposed about this period to a new source of trouble and disquiet. In consequence of the judicious proceedings of the Presbytery at Bangor in the year 1653, undisturbed harmony had hitherto existed among the members of the Presbytery. "There were no divisions among them, but were all perfectly joined together in the same mind and in the same judgment." Mutual respect and submission were inviolably maintained, and all cordially united in promoting the peace and prosperity of their Zion. An indiscreet and turbulent licentiate, however, began to distract the Church with his irregular proceedings, in which he persisted, in opposition to the advice of the Presbytery and the established rules of ecclesiastical order. The name of this person was David Houston. He had for a time supplied the congregation of Glenarm, which had been destitute of a minister from the period of Mr. Fleming's conformity to the Established Church, and he had afterwards supplied Ballymoney, vacant since the death of Mr. Ker. While officiating in this latter congregation, he appears to have first become acquainted with Mr. Alexander Peden, and to have imbibed from this pious and faithful, though enthusiastic, minister, that impatience of ecclesiastical restraint, and that love of ministering to popular excitement by collecting large crowds of people, at unusual times and places, in opposition to their settled ministers, which soon exposed him to the serious animadversions of his brethren. The Presbyteries both of Antrim<sup>35</sup> and of Route faithfully remonstrated with him on the mischiefs which must arise from his factious proceedings ; and at length, on the 23d of August, 1671, he appeared before the latter Presbytery at Macosquin, owned his irregularities, and engaged to read a public acknowledgment of them for the satisfaction of the people who had taken offence at his conduct.<sup>36</sup> But a peaceful course of ministerial duty in submission to his brethren had few attractions for him. He once more transgressed the settled order of the Church, in violation of his former engagements, and within a few months the Presbytery of Route were again compelled to interfere. In January, 1672, they

<sup>35</sup> The minutes of the Presbytery of Antrim, extending from July, 1671, to November, 1691, have been fortunately preserved, with the exception of an interval of eight years, from July, 1675, to February, 1683, the minutes of which have been lost out of the volume. In 1671, this Presbytery comprised twenty congregations, of which six were vacant. I have never been able to ascertain whether any portion of the records of the Presbyteries of Down, Tyrone, or Route, prior to the Revolution, has been preserved.

<sup>36</sup> Among the Wodrow MSS. in the Advocates' Library (M. 6, 14), I discovered several papers relative to Houston, which had been extracted from the minutes of the Presbytery of Route, by the clerk, the Rev. Thomas Boyd, of Aghadoey, and by him transmitted to Wodrow. The following is a copy of Mr Houston's acknowledgment before the Presbytery alluded to in the text :—" At Macosquin, August 23, 1671. The which day Mr. David Houston compeared before the meeting, and being interrogated whether or not he was sensible of his irregular carriage in counteracting the meeting's advice, and preaching in way of opposition by fixing tent against tent to the bringing a reproach against our way and opening the mouths of the wicked. To which he answered that he judged his carriage withal truly scandalous, and it had cost him many sad nights and rendered him salem insipidum, and declares that he will give it under his hand that, through the Lord's strength, he will never act contrary to the presbyterial meeting's advice where his lot shall be. Sic subscribitur coram conventum, David Houston. The which day Mr. Houston likewise undertook to read publicly, on purpose for the satisfaction of the people ; a true copy whereof follows, viz. :—" I, Mr. David Houston, after the serious consideration of my way in this place, and the offence it hath given unto the officers of Christ's house, do now declare that I am really sorry and grieved in my heart for my scandalous opposition to the Presbyterian way, in fixing tent against tent, or in being any way accessory either to the begetting or fomenting division among the godly in this place, to the giving occasion to the wicked to blaspheme : And I do declare that my resolution and purpose for the future is, to walk more regularly and to move in my public vocation only according to the advice of the reverend ministers of the presbytery in the place where my lot shall be. Also, I earnestly entreat all of you that have been engaged in any contest upon my account, to lay aside all animosities and unanimously follow the advice and counsel of the reverend presbytery in order to the establishing [of the Gospel amongst you, as the most probable ways of healing the breach."

advised him to remove for a time out of their bounds, that the divisions which he had fomented in several of their congregations might be the more readily allayed ; but having disdainfully rejected their friendly advice, and persevered in his former schismatical courses, at their monthly meeting at Macosquin, on the 27th of February, they withdrew his license to preach, and appointed the Rev. Thomas Wylie, the exiled minister of Kircudbright, who was supplying the congregation of Coleraine, to intimate his suspension in the congregation of Ballymoney.<sup>37</sup> The general committee approved of the conduct of

<sup>37</sup> From the MS. referred to in the preceding note, I am able to give the following minute of the Presbytery's suspension of him, which details his disorderly conduct :— "At Macosquin, Feb. 27, 1671—2. The which day the meeting of the Route taking to their consideration the insolent and contemptuous carriage of Mr. David Houston at and since their last meeting at Macosquin, the 9th day of January ; First, in his boisterous and stormy way of taking their advice off their hand, for removing out of the bounds of the meeting in order to the healing of the scandalous rent in the parish of Ballymoney, and to the timeous obstructing of the like rents beginning to appear in other congregations through his disorderly preaching without the meeting's allowance : And having in passion removed, and his disdainful refusing to return to hear what the brethren had further to say to him (though they sent one of their number to desire him to return for that effect), and also considering that instead of a quiet, sober, and peaceable acquiescing to the brethren's advice as became a probationer (who ought by the law of God and of His Church to be subject in the like cases unto the church meetings, under whose inspection they are), the said Mr. David did, the first Sabbath-day immediately thereafter, in contempt of the aforesaid advice, preach publicly at Ballymoney, and since, either at Ballymoney or Derrikeichan, or the border betwixt the two ; and not only, but likewise in the week-days unwarrantably and officiously hath thrust himself in upon another man's labours, setting up a lecture or preaching diet to himself at several times in the parish of Macosquin, hereby endeavouring to rend the parish asunder, and so to mar the work of the Lord in the place, and to obstruct the settlement of the Gospel there by the faithful man who labours amongst them : Which presumptuous practice of the said Mr. David Houston (a young man not ordained to the ministry, nor yet having passed trials in order to his ordination to any particular place within the bounds of the kingdom) do clearly evidence to all unbiassed and impartial men that he is a man of a vain and turbulent spirit, ambitiously affecting (for his own carnal ends it would appear) the work of the ministry, and rushing himself thereinto in a disorderly way, not only without, but contrary to, the mind of the brethren, and the known and approved order settled among them ; and even contrary to his own engagements under his own hand : WHEREFORE the meeting have unanimously suspended the said Mr. David Houston from all preaching and lecturing upon the Word publicly or privately as a probationer : As also, the meeting does hereby advise and exhort all the Lord's people within the bounds, and especially those of Ballymoney, Derrikeichan, and Macosquin, no longer to hear the said Mr. David as a licensed probationer, nor to look upon him as standing in any other capacity as to preaching or

the Presbytery, and directed further proceedings to be instituted against him, arising out of several alleged immoralities in his conduct while supplying Glenarm. But Houston, alarmed at these indications of the Presbytery's firmness and decision, once more resorted to the expedient of owning his misconduct and deprecating their severity. The Presbytery, being unable at this period to enter upon a public trial, or to cite witnesses without exposing the Church to imminent danger, were disposed to receive his confession the more willingly. He was obliged, however, to appear several times before the Presbyteries of Route and Antrim; till at length, after a suspension of a year and a half, he was restored to the office of a licentiate in July, 1673; and having subsequently received a testimonial, he appears to have retired to Scotland, and not to have returned to Ulster for several years. This self-willed and unstable preacher, by his irregular proceedings, laid the foundation of that schism in the Presbyterian Church in Ulster which still subsists; and he is claimed as one of the earliest witnesses to the peculiar opinions of the Covenanting or Reformed Presbyterian Church that appeared in the North of Ireland.<sup>38</sup>

Warned by the embarrassments arising out of this case, the Presbytery resolved to exercise increased caution in admitting persons to the ministry. For a considerable time after the Restoration there were few candidates for this perilous office; and after the Church began to enjoy a little repose, the principal accessions to the ministry consisted of ordained ministers from Scotland. In a short time, however, many young men who had received their collegiate education in that kingdom, lecturing, but only in that of a private unlicensed man; with certification that if they continue henceforth to keep up that sad and scandalous breach by adhering to and hearing of him, they will thereby deprive themselves of the benefit of the sealing ordinances and of marriage. And these premises were appointed to be read publicly, that none concerned pretend ignorance."

but who could find no opportunity there of being admitted to preach, came over to Ulster, and were placed on trials by the several Presbyteries. With regard to these inexperienced candidates, of whose previous character and conduct so little could be known, the utmost circumspection was necessary on the part of the church-courts, lest any of them should afterwards prove unsound or unqualified; and lest some of these applicants might be secret emissaries of the prelatical party, and betray the fact of the Presbytery exercising the power of ordination. Great caution was also required in ascertaining the minds of the vacant congregations, and in effecting the settlement of a minister in each, lest the legal incumbent should be needlessly provoked, or additional restraints be laid upon the exercise of discipline. The general committee, which met at Benburb in February, 1672, drew up a series of regulations for conducting the trial, ordination, and settlement of ministers adapted to the peculiar situation of the Church; which, being transmitted to the several presbyteries and revised by them, were ultimately adopted by the committee in October following, as a temporary measure until the Church should be restored to greater freedom.<sup>39</sup>

While engaged in maturing these "Rules for Ordination," an addition was made to the maintenance of ministers by the pension granted at this time by Charles II. Of this remarkable transaction—differing so much from the persecuting measures of his reign against Presbyterians, and constituting a precedent for that deviation from the ordinary maxims of state policy still existing in the case of the Irish Presbyterians—the

 “’Tis just the world should know the first motion that was made for that pension, and the consideration upon which ’twas granted, and has been now continued these forty years past without interruption, except during the reign of King James II., and a very few years in the latter end of the reign of King Charles II., when the ruin, not only of Presbyterians, but of all sober Churchmen, and of the Protestant religion itself, was upon the anvil. The account I am to give of this matter was drawn up by the late Reverend Mr. Alexander Hutcheson, Presbyterian minister at Tannagh-nive [Saintfield], in the county of Down.<sup>41</sup> He and three ministers more, viz., Mr. Patrick Adair, Mr. William Semple, and Mr. Archibald Hamilton, did all concur in the same account to the rest of their brethren, affirming that they had it from Sir Arthur Forbes’s own mouth. And they were all men of so much candour and veracity as no man of any good character, of whatsoever persuasion, would have called in question the truth of what any of them said, and far less of a fact they all agreed in. The account itself I shall give in Mr. Hutcheson’s own words, as he has left them under his hand, which is as follows :—

“The truly honourable Sir Arthur Forbes, the steadfast and real friend of the ministers and people in that part of the country, wrote for four ministers to come to him to Dublin, that he might communicate to them a matter wherein they were highly concerned. The ministers were Mr. Patrick Adair, Mr. William Semple, Mr. Alexander Hutcheson, and Mr. Archibald Hamilton, who all went to Dublin about the middle of October, 1672. The matter was, as he related it himself, as followeth :—He being a little time before in London, and being in conference with the King, who had a great kindness for him (and deservedly), the King amongst other things relating to this kingdom, inquired at him concerning the Presbyterian ministers and people in the north ; how the ministers lived, and that he had always been informed that they were loyal and had been sufferers on that account, and were peaceable in their way and carriage, notwithstanding of the hardships they were under.*

“ Sir Arthur replied ’twas a true account his majesty had heard of them ; and as to their present condition, they lived in no great plenty, though they had the affection of the people where they did reside, but that they were not in a capacity to afford them a comfortable subsistence, being under many heavy burdens. The King of his own meer motion told Sir Arthur that there was twelve hundred pounds a-year in the settlement of the revenue of Ireland which he had not yet disposed of, but designed it for a charitable use, and he knew not how to dispose of it better than by giving it to these ministers ; and told him he would forthwith give order, and desired Sir Arthur to bring the secretary to him to-morrow, that the order might be passed under the King’s privy seal, and the money to be paid to Sir Arthur quarterly for secret service, as the order ran ; but when the secretary came to the King, it was found there was only six hundred pounds to be disposed of, which he ordered to be paid, as is formerly related. Sir Arthur sent for the four ministers, partly to give account of the King’s business to them, partly that they might consider how to divide it ; which they considering apart agreed on this method—that each minister who was in the country in the year 1660 should have an equal proportion, and that the widows and orphans of those who were removed by death might share of the King’s bounty ; and when they told this to

[* At this time, according to the computation of Sir Wm. Petty, the inhabitants of Ireland amounted to 1,100,000—of whom 800,000 were Romanists, and 300,000 Protestants. Of the Protestants, 100,000 are described as Scotch Presbyterians. See Census of Ireland for 1861 ; Parl. IV., vol i. ; Report on Religion and Education, p. 1.]

Sir Arthur, he was much pleased with what they had done, and ordered the present payment for the first quarter.<sup>42</sup> He also told the ministers that it was very becoming them to signify, by a letter of thanks to the King, the sense they had of his majesty's singular favour; and another letter to Duke Lauderdale, and a third to Sir Robert Murray, who were ready to do what service they could for their countrymen here, and had spoke in their favour; all which letters were drawn and communicated to Sir Arthur, and by him sent over to London; which were graciously accepted, as both Duke Lauderdale and Sir Robert Murray signified by their letters to Sir Arthur, which they desired him to communicate to the ministers; which he did as opportunity offered."

For several years after this period few events occurred of special interest or importance to the Church. The Presbyteries proceeded steadily, though cautiously, in planting ministers, not only throughout the north, but in several places in the south and west of the kingdom.<sup>43</sup> They laboured assiduously in instructing their people, warning them against prevalent errors and vices, maintaining strict discipline, and exercising a faithful superintendence over the affairs of congregations and the conduct of each other. They encouraged the erection of a school for philosophy, and subsequently of one for theology at Antrim, over which presided the celebrated John Howe, then domestic chaplain to the Massareene family, and the Rev. Thomas Gowan, the Presbyterian minister of the parish, a man of distinguished learning and elevated piety.<sup>44</sup> The ministers were still subjected to frequent annoyances and persecutions from the prelatical party. Their marriages, though solemnized publicly after proclamation in their places of worship, and in most cases after proclamation in the parish churches, were often subjects of prosecution and of censure in the ecclesiastical courts. Multitudes of the laity were occasionally summoned before the bishop's court for refusing to attend on the established worship, or to execute the office of churchwarden, or for some similar misdemeanour, and many were excommunicated or subjected to heavy fines.<sup>45</sup> Spies were employed by government among the ministers to betray their proceedings, and give notice of any communications which they might maintain with their brethren in Scotland. So loyal and discreet, however, was their conduct, that for several years they were not exposed to any molestation.

<sup>42</sup> I have very carefully investigated the fiscal history of this grant, and, with the aid of documents in the Chief Secretary's office, Dublin Castle, I have ascertained the following particulars respecting it. It first appears on "The Establishment or List, containing all the payments to be made for civil affairs, to begin from the 25th of March, 1672," in which it is thus entered among the "Pensions and Annuities":—"Sir Arthur Forbesse, our Marshall of Ireland, for secret services without account, £600." When this establishment was renewed in 1676, the same entry appears thus:—"Lord Viscount Granard, Marshall of Ireland, for secret services without account, £600." This warrant was in force till 1682, when a new establishment was issued in which this item was omitted, as it is also in that for 1684, the last civil list on record till after the Revolution. This grant, which was strictly a pension, not an endowment, continued, therefore, in force from 1672 to 1682. But it does not thence follow that it was regularly paid during these ten years, for the warrants provide that the deficiencies in the revenue, which were always very great, should fall upon the pension list; and Mr. Hardinge, the intelligent and obliging keeper of the records deposited in the Custom House, Dublin, informs me that, among the public accounts, he can find only one entry of such a payment having been made—to wit, in the civil list establishment for 1676. This result corroborates a tradition I have heard, that this Regium Donum was enjoyed by the ministers for only one year; yet it is spoken of in "Presbyterian Loyalty" (see p. 333, antea), as if it had been paid "without interruption, except during the reign of King James II., and a very few years in the latter end of the reign of King Charles II."—i.e., from 1682, when it was first omitted in the civil list, until the King's death in February, 1685. I may add, that I have searched in vain for any notice of this grant in the minutes of Presbytery for that period which are extant. See Wodrow's "Analecta," iv., 231, 232, for some additional facts respecting the origin of the Regium Donum.

<sup>43</sup> Thus I find the several presbyteries sending supplies to Sligo, Roscommon, and Longford; and to Wicklow, Wexford, Ross, Clonmel, Tipperary, and Waterford. The minutes of the Presbytery of Lagan are extant from August, 1672, to July, 1681, when they are abruptly closed, the clerk and three other members having been seized and cast into prison, and the regular meetings of Presbytery suspended for several years, as related afterwards. This Presbytery had under its care above twenty congregations. So early as November, 1673, I find them, by appointment of the general committee, ordaining the Rev. William Cock or Cox to the charge of Clonmel, and the Rev. William Liston to that of Waterford, whence he afterwards removed to Letterkenny, in Donegal.

<sup>44</sup> The Rev. JOHN HOWE came to Antrim in May, 1671, where he resided constantly till his return to England in 1676. His name occurs frequently in the minutes of the Antrim Presbytery, as cordially concurring with the ministers in various duties. The Rev. THOMAS GOWAN was born at Caldermuir, in Scotland, in 1631; he settled at Glasslough, near Monaghan, about 1658, whence he removed to Connor about 1667. He supplied this congregation; and taught the languages and philosophy, till 1672, when he was installed in the charge of Antrim, where he was so highly esteemed that he was invited and permitted for a time to conduct the public worship of his congregation in the parish church. He taught philosophy at Antrim privately until 1674, when his seminary was taken under the care of the Church, and a divinity school under Mr. Howe and himself was added to it in the following year. He died in August, 1683, having published in Latin two valuable works on logic, the one entitled "Ars Sciendi, sive Logica novo methodo disposita et novis præceptis aucta," London, 1682, 18mo, pp. 460; the other, "Logica Elenctica, sive summa controversiarum quæ circa materiam et præcepta Logica agitari solent, &c. Authore Thoma Goveano, M.A." 1683, 18mo, pp. 505. To the latter work is added a small tract, entitled, "Elementa Logicæ paucis aphorismis comprehensa," pp. 12. These volumes are now exceedingly rare.

The first incident which revived the jealousy of the state resulted out of that ill-conducted enterprise of the oppressed Presbyterians in Scotland, which terminated in the decisive battle of Bothwell Bridge on the 22d of June, 1679. The news of this insurrection alarmed Ormond, who had been once more appointed to the office of lord-lieutenant. He immediately ordered a frigate to cruise in the Irish Channel, to cut off all communication with Scotland, and at the same time despatched a considerable reinforcement to augment the garrison at Carrickfergus. He directed the Earl of Mount-Alexander to station his troop of horse at Larne and the other creeks on the eastern coast of Antrim, and sent orders to Lord Conway and Sir George Rawdon to employ their companies in apprehending

<sup>45</sup> Thus, in August, 1675, a letter from John Orr, of Letterkenny, was submitted to the Presbytery of Lagan, who thereon resolved to write to Lord Massareene "that he may interpose his moyn with the prelate of Rhoë to make him surcease his further persecution of the said John Orr." This prelate was Ezekiel Hopkins, who had been formerly a Nonconformist minister in England, and ejected in 1662 (see Calamy's Cont., ii., 473), but who subsequently conformed, and was rewarded with the bishopric of Raphoe, which he held from 1671, to 1681, when he was translated to Derry. Again, in March, 1676, the Rev. Thomas Fulton, correspondent from Route to the Presbytery of Lagan, asked their advice "what they may and should do in order to the remedying of the oppressions and grievances of many people of the congregations of their bounds by the prelational party; eight score summoned in some single parishes to the official courts, and many other particulars of prelational persecutions are mentioned, as the summoning of many, and the excommunicating of many, and the taking of some with writs, and the people's being exhausted with paying of sums of money, &c. This meeting [of Lagan] advise them to consult our friends in Dublin how they shall proceed in seeking a remedy for these grievances: and not to appear before the prelatical courts, and not to give any money to the prelatical party to buy their peace."—MS. Min. of Lagan.

all persons coming from Scotland at this crisis.<sup>46</sup> Exaggerated reports that the Presbyterians of Ulster were ready to join in a similar insurrection were studiously conveyed to the lord-lieutenant, who, it was alleged, was preparing once more to apprehend and imprison their ministers. Under these circumstances, the several presbyteries thought it their duty to endeavour to remove these unfounded suspicions, and avert the danger threatening to themselves and to their Church by a renewed declaration of their loyalty and peaceableness. The Presbytery of Down accordingly drew up an address to Ormond, vindicating themselves from the aspersions of their enemies, and declaring their continued obedience to the law. The brethren of Antrim adopted a similar address, which was presented to the lord-lieutenant by the Rev. Thomas Gowan, of Antrim, and the Rev. Robert Paton, of Ballyclare, and the same course was followed by the other presbyteries. It was further proposed, in a letter to their steadfast friend, Sir Arthur Forbes, now Lord-Viscount and afterwards Earl of Granard, to unite in a joint address from all the presbyteries to the King; but it is uncertain whether this proposal was carried into effect.<sup>47</sup> These representations, however, succeeded in allaying the apprehensions of Ormond; and the ministers continued to enjoy their former freedom and security, till about a year and a half afterwards an occasion was eagerly seized by their enemies to expose them to renewed severities.

The Presbytery of Lagan, in the beginning of the year 1681,

<sup>47</sup> I have inserted in the Appendix copies of the address by the Presbytery of Down, to Ormond, taken from the Wodrow MSS., in the Advocates' Library, Edinburgh, and of the letter from Lagan to Lord Granard, extracted from the MS. minutes of that Presbytery. Alexander Peden was again in Ulster at this period, and his admiring and credulous biographer relates, that when he heard of the two ministers from Antrim going to Dublin with their address to Ormond, "Mr. Peden said, Mr. Gowans and his brother Paton are sent and gone the devil's errand, but God shall arrest them by the gate: accordingly, Mr. Gowans by the way was struck by a sore sickness, and Mr. Paton fell from his horse and broke or crushed his leg; and both of them were detained beyond expectation."—"Biog. had resolved to hold a fast in all their congregations, and in accordance with their usual practice on such occasions, they drew up a paper, containing the causes of the proposed fast, which was publicly read on the previous Sabbath in their respective places of worship. Shortly after the magistrates in that district, being intolerant Prelatists, pressed the oath of supremacy with unusual eagerness on the officers and soldiers in the Lagan. Numbers of these, being Presbyterians, refused to take this ensnaring oath except with certain explanations, which were not admitted; and in this refusal it was believed they were encouraged by the Presbytery. A copy of the causes of the late fast having, about the same time, fallen into the hands of these zealous magistrates, they summoned four of the neighbouring ministers, to wit, the Rev. William Trail, of Lifford, the Rev James Alexander, of Raphoe,* the Rev. Robert Campbell, of Ray, and the Rev. John Hart, of Taughboyne,<sup>48</sup> to appear before them at Raphoe on Tuesday the 3rd of May. The magistrates present were Sir William Stewart, of Ramelton, Bart.,<sup>49</sup> Gray Bingley, Esquire, the high sheriff, Captain Nesbitt, Hugh Hamill, of Lifford, John Forward,<sup>50</sup> and Michael Sampson, Esquires. They examined

[* The present parish of Convoiy was then part of the parish of Raphoe; and though the meeting-house was in Convoiy, the minister was called the minister of Raphoe. Raphoe was erected into a separate congregation about the middle of the last century.]

<sup>48</sup> Mr. TRAIL was, I believe, brother to the Rev. Robert Trail, of London. He came over to Ulster a licentiate, in 1671, and was ordained the following year in Lifford. After his release from prison he returned to Scotland, and died minister of Borthwick. Mr. ALEXANDER was ordained to the charge of Raphoe, December 12, 1677. Mr. CAMPBELL was ordained in Ray (or Raymoghy), in 1671, and Mr. HART, in Taughboyne, in 1656. In October, 1655, a commissioner from that parish attended the synod of Glasgow and Ayr, with a call to Mr. Hart, who was then minister at Hamilton. —Min. of Synod —Woodrow MSS., Bib. Jour., Edin., fol. xxxviii.

<sup>49</sup> This Sir William Stewart was the only son of Sir Alexander Stewart, who was slain at the battle of Dunbar, in 1650. (See Chap. XIV, Note 13, ante.) He had now renounced the religious principles of his family, and become the persecutor of those whom both his father and grandfather had so uniformly favoured. In the following year he was rewarded for his severities against the Presbyterians by his elevation to the peerage, with the title of Baron Stewart, of Ramelton, and Viscount Mountjoy.

<sup>50</sup> The Forward family settled at Newtowncunningham, about the year 1635. (Lords' Journ., i., 268.) Mr. Forward mentioned in the text was maternal ancestor to the ministers relative to their observance of the recent fast and the statement of its causes which was then in their possession. The brethren at once acknowledged that they had kept the fast, and that they concurred in the paper of causes or reasons for it which was produced by the bench. On this open and candid avowal they were discharged; but within a few weeks they were summoned to appear in Dublin. On two separate occasions they were closely examined in the presence of the lord-lieutenant and the privy council, respecting their proceedings in relation to the fast, and on some other subjects connected with their conduct as nonconforming ministers. They were in a short time dismissed on bail to appear before the summer assizes at Lifford; when being indicted for holding the fast in question, they were found guilty by a packed jury of High Churchmen, and sentenced to pay a fine of twenty pounds each, to subscribe an engagement not to offend in a similar manner again, and to be imprisoned till they should comply. They continued in prison rather than enter into the sinful engagement demanded. They were confined in Lifford, the present Earl of Wicklow, his grand-daughter and sole heir, Alice, having in 1755 married the first earl. In 1686, he was high-sheriff for Donegal, and was reported to the council in England, then anxious to discountenance every one opposed to the Roman Catholics, as "a zealous Protestant and famous priest-catcher." But to this report, intended to injure him, Lord Clarendon, the lord-lieutenant, appended the following explanation:—"This gentleman is a very good Protestant of the Church of England, and very loyal, but never was a priest-catcher; and the occasion which draws this reflection upon him is, because at a quarter-sessions held at Raphoe, the 24th day of April, 1684, he, with other justices of the peace then upon the bench, was active in putting in execution that statute made in this kingdom, the second of Queen Elizabeth, for the uniformity of the Common Prayer, which the said justices intended principally against the Nonconformist Protestants, who swarm much more in that county than the Roman Catholics." (Clarendon's Correspondence, i., 286.) From this curious list of the Irish sheriffs for 1686, I may extract the following notice of the gentleman appointed for Antrim, who was great-grand-uncle to the present Earl of Ranfurly, and an eminent merchant in Belfast till the year 1697, when he retired from business to his estate at Dungannon, then recently purchased from the Earl of Donegall. (Pres. Loy., 422. Lodge vii., 198.) "ANTRIM, Thomas KNOX, a Presbyterian Scotch Whig. Answer. This character must be given out of prejudice and particular pique, for there is not the least shadow of truth in it; this person being notoriously known to be a constant frequenter of the church, and never resorted to any conventicle since he lived at Belfast, where he is the most considerable merchant"—Clar. Corresp., ut supra.

though not very rigorously, for above eight months ; when they were released by the sheriff, and their fines afterwards remitted by the court of exchequer on payment of their fees.<sup>51</sup>

The condemnation of these ministers was a signal for the violent Prelatists throughout Ulster to renew their persecuting measures against the Nonconformists. The Presbyterian meeting-houses were closed, and the public exercise of their worship was interdicted. The penalties of recusancy were, in many districts, inflicted by an intolerant magistracy with unwonted severity on both ministers and people; and presbyteries were once more reduced to the necessity of meeting in private, and of exercising their jurisdiction with the utmost caution and reserve. These harassing restrictions continued during the two following years. The same spirit of servile compliance with the court in all its unconstitutional measures, and the same implacable hatred towards the friends of civil or religious freedom which, at this period, were so rampant in England, and under the baleful influence of which Russell and Sydney were brought to the scaffold, were now also predominant in Ulster, and contributed to increase the privations of the people, obnoxious not less on account of their nonconformity than their resolute opposition to arbitrary power. During the year 1684, the state of the Presbyterians in the counties of Derry and Donegal was so deplorable, that the greater number of the ministers composing the Presbytery of the Lagan intimated to the other presbyteries their intention of removing to America, whither some of them had been already invited, "because of persecutions and general poverty abounding in those parts, and on account of their straits and little or no access to their ministry."<sup>52</sup> But the death of Charles II. in the following year, and the subsequent appointment of Lord Granard as one of the lords-justices, mitigated, for a time, the more pressing evils of their condition.

<sup>52</sup> MS. Min. of Ant. From the minutes of the Lagan Presbytery, I find a Captain Archibald Johnston applying to them, in August, 1678, to assist him in procuring a minister for Barbadoes; and, in December, 1680, a "Colonel Stevens from Maryland, beside Virginia," wrote to the same Presbytery for a minister to settle in that colony. It appears that, not long after, the Rev. Francis Mackemy or Mackamie,* who had been licensed by them in 1681, was ordained on this call of Colonel Stevens; but, as their minutes are deficient at this period during several years, for the reason mentioned in a preceding note (43), the precise date of his ordination and removal to America cannot be ascertained. Mr. Mackamie was from the neighbourhood of Ramelton, in Donegal, and was first introduced to the Presbytery in January, 1680, by his minister, the Rev. T. Drummond. He settled in Accomac County, on the eastern shore of Virginia, where he died in 1708. He was the first Presbyterian minister who settled in North America, and, with a few other brethren from Ulster, constituted the first regular Presbytery that was organised in the New World. It is an interesting circumstance in the History of the Presbyterian Church in Ireland, that it was the parent stock of the American Presbyterian Church, which now comprises nearly three thousand congregations. [Since the first edition of this work appeared, much additional light has been cast on the early ecclesiastical history of America by various publications. In the former part of the seventeenth century, several Presbyterian ministers connected with the Dutch Reformed Church laboured in the New World. The first of these, the Rev. Everard Boghard, is said to have perished at sea in 1647. (Baird's Religion in the United States, p. 577.) Between 1670 and 1680, Scottish Presbyterians settled in Virginia, and had a minister from Ireland, who died in August, 1683. (Webster's History of the Presbyterian Church in America, p. 66. Philadelphia, 1857.) But Makemie stood at the head of the first Presbytery established in the American colonies, and was probably its organiser. Several other members of the Presbytery are said to have been Irish. Makemie made two voyages from America to England in quest of aid in his evangelistic operations. On his return from his second visit in 1705, he was accompanied by Messrs. Hempton and Macnish, two ministers whom he had persuaded to cast in their lot along with him as labourers in his adopted country. In January, 1707, Makemie was imprisoned for preaching at New York without the permission of the Governor—Edward Hyde, Lord Cornbury—a violent High Churchman, and cousin of Queen Anne. He was at length liberated, but not until he had paid costs amounting to upwards of £80. Makemie has been described as "a man of eminent piety and strong intellectual powers, adding to force of talents a fascinating address, conspicuous for his dignity and faithfulness as a minister of the Gospel." Webster, p. 310. The various sections of the Presbyterian Church in North America at present reckon upwards of six thousand congregations].

* I find Mr. Francis M'Kemy preaching for Mr. Hempton in Burt, April 2, 1682, from Luke xiii. 3, forenoon and afternoon. In the year 1675, he was enrolled as student in the University of Glasgow as "Franciscus Makemius, Scoto Hybernus."

JAMES the Second was formally proclaimed in Dublin on the 11th of February, 1685. The accession of this arbitrary monarch and bigoted Romanist to the throne did not, at first, produce any sensible alteration in the management of Irish affairs. It was not long, however, until intelligible indications were afforded that a material change of policy, long expected and apprehended, towards the rival parties of Romanists and Protestants, had been resolved upon by the court. That the government of Ireland would be conducted more favourably to the former party, proscribed and persecuted as they had previously been, was generally anticipated; and had such an alteration been impartially effected, without the reckless infraction of law and the studied insults to the latter by which it was characterised, it would probably have met with no successful opposition. But the establishment of arbitrary power and the overthrow of Protestantism were inseparable parts of that grand enterprise to which James had resolved to devote all his energies and resources.<sup>1</sup>

It would be foreign to the design of this work to detail the gradual development of his plans for the accomplishment of these objects in Ireland. Nor is such a detail necessary. No portion of British history has been so fully illustrated as this has been, nor is there any, the leading facts of which are so generally admitted;<sup>2</sup> but the progress of that resistance which the arbitrary government of James encountered in Ulster has not yet been traced with the minuteness which its triumphant success and its momentous results so amply merit. While, therefore a very brief summary of the well-known events which preceded the arrival of the Prince of Orange in England may suffice, it will be more gratifying to the reader, and more in accordance with this HISTORY, to relate at length the rise of that memorable opposition to arbitrary power, in which the Presbyterians of Ulster bore so conspicuous a part.

<sup>1</sup> This is unequivocally avowed by James himself in a letter to the Pope from Dublin, dated November 26, 1689, in which, speaking of the opposition he had encountered, he says - "the only source of all these rebellions against us is that we embraced the Catholic faith, and do not disown but that to spread the same not only in our three kingdoms, but over all the dispersed colonies of our subjects in America, was our determination."—MSS., Royal Irish Academy, of which see Note 53 postea.

<sup>2</sup> The official despatches and state letters of Lord Clarendon furnish minute and authentic information respecting the progress of events during his viceroyalty, and leave nothing to be desired as to this period. But, as yet, there is want of similar materials for illustrating the government of his successor, Tyrconnel. Lord Clarendon's correspondence was first published in 1763 by Dr. Douglass, bishop of Salisbury; but an enlarged edition, containing many papers not in the former one, was published by S. W. Singer, Esq., in 1828. It is to this recent edition that I refer throughout this chapter.

No sooner had the invasion of Monmouth in England, and of Argyle in Scotland, been successfully repulsed, than James found himself at leisure to attend to the affairs of Ireland. Under the pretence that numbers of the Irish Protestants were privy to those attempts against his government, he ordered the militia throughout the kingdom, who were exclusively Protestants, to be disarmed, and their arms to be deposited in the public stores. This order was executed without opposition, though with much secret distrust of the King's intentions. In the end of the year, the lords-justices were removed, and the government was intrusted to Henry, Lord Clarendon. He was sworn into office as lord-lieutenant on the 9th of January 1686, and from his relationship to the King, and his hereditary attachment to royalty, it was expected he would cordially promote all the measures of the court. These were speedily disclosed, and too promptly executed.<sup>3</sup> So early as the month of March, James declared his determination not to appoint any bishops to the sees of Cashel, Elphin, and Clonfert, then vacant, and directed their revenues to be paid into the treasury, with the view, though not yet avowed, of creating a fund for the endowment of the Roman Catholic hierarchy. This virtual suppression of three bishoprics was accompanied with complaints that the Protestant ministers in Ireland "meddled with controversy more than was necessary or expedient;" and the new viceroy was ordered to take especial care to repress all controversial discourses against the tenets of Popery—an order which he too readily obeyed. At the same time, three irreproachable Protestant judges, one in each court, were summarily superseded, and as many Catholic lawyers nominated in their places; while orders were peremptorily issued, in defiance of the law, to admit Roman Catholics to be members of the privy-council and of corporations—to be magistrates and sheriffs, without taking the oaths prescribed by repeated acts of parliament. In April, Lord Tyrconnel, a most violent and intemperate Romanist, was appointed lieutenant-general, with full powers, independent of the lord-lieutenant, to remodel the entire army in Ireland. This uncontrolled authority he exercised in the most indiscreet and tyrannical manner. Protestant officers and soldiers were removed on the most frivolous pretexts, and their places filled exclusively by Roman Catholics, whose priests were advanced to military chaplaincies. All these measures of ostentatious favouritism to the one party and of undisguised hostility to the other, were everywhere observed with the deepest interest; and, as their natural result, extravagant expectations, relative to the subversion of Protestantism, the re-establishing of the Papal Church, and the recovery of the forfeited lands, were unreservedly expressed by the Romish priests and gentry, to the great alarm of the Protestants and the manifest injury of the public interests of the kingdom.<sup>4</sup>

<sup>3</sup> This Protestant nobleman was too ready to execute the orders of James and his councillors; but he afterwards saw his error, and was among the earliest adherents of the Prince of Orange. Before assuming the government of Ireland, his friend, Lord Guildford, anxious to assist him in that office, addressed to him a paper, entitled, "Observations on the State of Ireland," in which is the following curious account of the tenets of the Presbyterians. After remarking to Lord Clarendon that "it will be a matter of great difficulty to steer a right course in religion, because the number of Presbyterians as well as Catholics are so very great," and after setting forth the dangerous principles of the latter, those of the former, whom he unceremoniously styles "fanatics," are thus expounded:—"On the other side, the fanatics disallow the king's supremacy, though they will take the oath of supremacy to avoid punishment. They hold an assembly of the clergy, or the classes, to have their commission immediately from God; and that if any laws are contrary to the law of God, they are void, and they may declare them to be so. That if kings are wicked and transgress the laws of God, the people may depose them. These are the doctrines of Calvin and other Presbyterians, and their practice has been always conformable whenever it was in their power; therefore, they ought to be discouraged by all ways possible, that their numbers may never give hopes to their false teachers to overturn the government again."—Clar. Corresp., i., 185.

This alarm was heightened by the recal of Lord Clarendon,

and the appointment of the most obnoxious Romanist in the empire to be his successor. The notorious Tyrconnel was sworn into office, as lord-deputy of Ireland, on the 12th of February, 1687. He prosecuted, with increased audacity and violence, the same career of reckless disregard to law, when it stood in the way of the royal projects for establishing Catholic ascendancy, which had characterised the administration of his predecessor. He had, besides, this further object in view, which he cautiously concealed from all the other ministers of the King—the separation of Ireland from the crown of England, should the King die without male issue, and be succeeded by a Protestant, and its erection into an independent nation under the protection of France. In this treasonable scheme he was supported by Louis the Fourteenth, with whom the requisite correspondence was conducted with so much secrecy, that even the French ambassador at the English court was wholly ignorant of it.<sup>5</sup> The new deputy applied himself with vigour to the multiplied duties of his office. Having already succeeded in placing the military power of the State in the hands of the Romanists, his next attempt was to transfer to the same party the civil and corporate authority of the kingdom. A recent convert to Popery was accordingly made lord-chancellor, though wholly unfit, in point of knowledge and integrity, for this high station; and by the rapid advancement of the professors of the same faith, only three Protestants, and these of little weight, were left upon the bench. At the same time, the office of attorney-general was also transferred from a Protestant to a Roman Catholic; while the more lucrative and influential situations in the courts of law and in the collection of the revenue were bestowed on the adherents of the favoured creed. Of the high-sheriffs for the year 1687, one only was a Protestant, and this person, the sheriff for Donegal, had been appointed by mistake in lieu of a Romanist of the same name.<sup>6</sup> Though the way had been already opened for the admission of Roman Catholics to corporations, by proclamations in defiance of the law, this measure was found inadequate to subject these bodies, as speedily as was desired, to the control of that party. A further encroachment on corporate rights was the necessary result. Intimidation and flattery induced a few of the less considerable towns to surrender their charters; but the refractory cities, which dared to be independent, were harassed by proceedings at law. The obsequious and servile judges uniformly pronounced judgment against their rights. Their charters were recalled, new corporations were constituted, consisting either altogether of Romanists, or with a few Protestants intermixed merely to save appearances, and in a short time the corporate property and jurisdiction throughout Ireland were exclusively vested in the ascendant party. The first corporation in Ulster which was reconstructed in this arbitrary manner was Dungannon; its municipal officers were appointed in March, 1688. In the month of August, Strabane and Derry, in the following month, Newry, and in October, Armagh and Belfast; were placed under the exclusive control of the Roman Catholics. To the other corporations in Ulster no charters were in the meantime granted.<sup>7</sup>

<sup>5</sup> For this interesting fact we are indebted to the industry of Mazure, who discovered it in the despatches of Bonrepaux. This scheme was carried on with the knowledge and consent of James, to the injury of his daughter, then the heir-apparent; but the birth of the Prince of Wales rendered it unnecessary."—Mazure, ii., 287; Lingard, xiv., 137.

In ecclesiastical affairs, a similar though more cautious and wary course was pursued. To the Roman Catholic prelates liberal pensions were allocated out of the revenues of the vacant sees, to which that of Clogher was now added. The Popish clergy wore with ostentation their clerical habits, and in many parishes the priests sought to dispossess the legal incumbents of their tithes, and appropriate them to their own use. To encourage the Protestant ministers to conform to the favoured Church, dispensations were granted to the few who apostatised, empowering them to continue in possession of their benefices, notwithstanding their renunciation of the established religion—an exercise of the prerogative hitherto unprecedented. The most noted of these converts was Doctor Peter Manby. He was educated in Trinity College, Dublin, obtained a scholarship in 1667, and in September, 1672, was preferred to the deanery of Derry. Soon after Tyrconnel's arrival as lord-deputy, an accession of light burst on his mind; he very seasonably discovered, at one and the same time, the errors, as well as the inconveniences, of Protestantism; he made formal profession of the Romish faith, and in July, 1687, a dispensation was issued, continuing him in the undisturbed enjoyment of the temporalities annexed to the deanery.<sup>8</sup>

<sup>8</sup> Dub. Univ. Cal. for 1834, p. 85; Liber Hiberniæ, part v., pp. 116, 119. Immediately after his change of faith, Manby published a tract, entitled, "The Considerations which induced Peter Manby, dean of Derry, to embrace the Catholique Religion." Dub., 1687, 4to, pp. 19. To this publication the Rev. W. King, chancellor of St. Patrick's, Dublin, replied in a pamphlet, entitled, "An Answer to the Considerations which obliged Peter Manby, dean of Derry (as he pretends), to embrace what he calls the Catholick Religion." Dub., 1687, 4to, pp. 99. Mr. King, who was afterwards bishop of Derry, and the keen antagonist and bitter reviler of the Presbyterians, early showed his intolerant spirit by attacking them in this "Answer," accusing them of schism and ecclesiastical rebellion, reproaching them for making use of the liberty of worship secured to them by the King's declaration, and branding them all as favourers of Popery and enemies of the Protestant cause. These unseasonable provocations and unfounded calumnies met an immediate and able reply from the pen of the Rev. J. Boyse, minister of New Row congregation, Dublin, who published it under the title of "Vindiciæ Calvinisticæ; or some impartial reflections on the Dean of Londonderry's Considerations that obliged him to come over to the communion of the Church of Rome, and Mr. Chancellor King's Answer thereto, in which he no less unjustly than impertinently reflects on the Protestant Dissenters. In a letter to a friend, by W. B., D.D." Dub., 1688, 4to, pp. 68. Manby replied to King, who vindicated his "Answer" against the dean's strictures, when the Revolution happily terminated the controversy. Manby fled to France, but afterwards returned to London, where he died in 1697. (Ware's "Writers.") The only other clergyman who appears from the public records to have apostatised and received a dispensation was the Rev. Alexander Moore. He was made apocentor of Connor and vicar of Glenavy and Crumlin, August 13, 1688; and by patent, dated the 26th of the following month, the King granted a dispensation similar

While this insidious attempt to undermine the Established Church roused the indignation of the Episcopalians, an effort was made to conciliate the Presbyterians and Dissenters, and to "enlist under the standard of arbitrary power those who had been its most intrepid and steadiest adversaries."<sup>9</sup> A further object was, to create a division among the Protestants of the empire, and thus weaken their strength as a party, and render their opposition to the growing encroachments of the court less formidable. On the 4th of April, James issued his celebrated "Declaration for liberty of conscience," suspending, by virtue of his royal prerogative, the execution of all the penal laws for religious offences, and prohibiting the imposition of religious tests as qualifications for office.<sup>10</sup>

This Declaration extended to Ireland, and afforded a seasonable relief to the Presbyterians from persecution, which, since the King's accession, had continued unabated, until the fears of the Episcopalians for their own Church induced them to relax in their severities towards the Nonconformists. Ministers now re-entered their places of worship, which had remained forcibly closed during the last five years. Stated meetings of Presbytery were publicly held; ruling-elders resumed their seats as constituent members of these courts; and all ecclesiastical functions were exercised without molestation or apprehension.<sup>11</sup> The hands of their recent intolerant persecutors were tied up, and religious freedom was unexpectedly established, but upon a very precarious and unconstitutional basis. The Presbyterians of Ulster, though fully aware of the insidious design of the Declaration, did not hesitate to avail themselves of the liberty thus granted, and resume the exerto what Manby enjoyed. (Harris's "William III.," p. 502; Lib. Hib., ut supra.) The same illegal course was pursued in Scotland. See Fountainhall's "Chronological Notes," p. 208.

cise of rights which had been long unjustly withheld. Exertions were made by Tyrconnel and the friends of the court to procure addresses to James on this occasion from the Irish Nonconformists. Accordingly, in the month of June, an address "from the Presbyterian ministers and congregations in and near the city of Dublin," and a second from "the Congregationalists of New Row," in the same city, were forwarded to London. And in the following month, one from persons styling themselves "Dissenting subjects in Munster," and another designated as coming from "the Presbyterian ministers of Ulster," were transmitted to the lord-deputy and presented to the King.<sup>12</sup> No copy of the last-mentioned address having been preserved, it is impossible to ascertain by how many northern ministers it was signed, nor in what language they expressed their gratitude for the favourable change which the royal declaration had effected in their situation and prospects. From their characteristic firmness and independence, it may be safely inferred they gave no approval of the slavish doctrine of the dispensing power of the crown; and from no notice of this address occurring in the contemporary records of one of the largest and most influential Presbyteries in Ulster, it must have been the production of only a few brethren, overjoyed at their unexpected deliverance from manifold grievances.<sup>13</sup>

<sup>12</sup> In the London Gazette, No. 2253, dated June 20, 1687, the address from the Dublin ministers and congregations is printed at length, but that from the New Row Independents is only referred to. In the Gazette, No. 2262, July 23, the address from the Munster Dissenters is also printed, while that from Ulster is only reported as having been presented. It was probably not courtly enough to entitle it to be printed. These four were the only addresses transmitted from Ireland. The Munster Dissenters state in their address, that the first cessation of persecution was occasioned by a proclamation from Tyrconnel, dated the 21st of February, 1686-87. I have not seen any other reference to this proclamation. See p. 39 of Peterkin's pamphlet on the "Constitution of the Church of Scotland," where it appears that James's proclamation for toleration in Scotland was dated Feb. 12, 1687.

<sup>13</sup> The only Presbytery whose minutes are extant for this period, is that of Antrim, and in these there is not the slightest trace of any such address having been proposed, or agreed to, or ordered to be presented, while addresses on all other occasions are invariably noticed.

During the brief interval of tranquillity which the ministers now enjoyed, they were once more perplexed with David Houston, who, after an absence of several years in Scotland, had returned to Ulster. Resuming his schismatical practices, and declaiming against the Presbytery as unsound and unfaithful, preparations were made for his formal trial, and the necessary citations were served on him. But being invited, in the month of September, 1686, by the followers of Renwick and Peden, to join their society, and exercise his ministry among them, he withdrew to Scotland in December following. The Presbytery of Route, with the concurrence of the other meetings, proceeded in his trial, and he was finally deposed from the office of the ministry, in communion with the Church in Ireland, on the 8th of February, 1687.<sup>14</sup> In the meantime he continued to preach in Scotland, until the beginning of the year 1688, when the apprehension of Renwick obliged him to seek refuge among his friends in Ulster, generally styled Houstonites,<sup>15</sup> who appear to have been most numerous in the district lying between Randalstown and Ballymoney, in the county of Antrim. Here he was taken prisoner in the end of May by officers sent from Scotland, but under what circumstances has not been recorded, and was transmitted to Edinburgh, where his friend and colleague, the pious and intrepid Renwick, had been barbarously executed a few months previously. His adherents in Ayrshire, having received private information of the route by which he was conducted to prison, boldly attacked the soldiers who accompanied him; and having killed several of the escort, they succeeded in effecting his rescue. It is said he was afterwards disowned, for some

These persons had now seceded from the ministry in Ulster on the same grounds on which a similar separation had previously taken place in Scotland, and they became the founders of the Covenanting or Reforming Presbyterian Church, which professes to hold by the original principles of the Covenantant Reformation, from which, they allege, all the other sections of the Presbyterian Church have, more or less, departed.

irregularities, by his Scottish friends; but his subsequent history has sunk into oblivion.<sup>16</sup>

Though the Declaration for liberty of conscience restored peace to Ulster, and put an end to the disturbances caused by the violence of the High Church party against the Non-conformists, all things portended the approach of unusual commotions. During the whole of the year 1688, every possible means was unscrupulously used to lay popular rights prostrate at the feet of a despotic and bigoted monarch. In this hour of peril, the Presbyterians generously forgot their past sufferings from the Episcopalians, and cordially joined with their recent persecutors in opposing the rising ascendancy of the Romanists, which, being based upon the most wanton exercise of arbitrary power, and accompanied with the most provoking insults to their common faith, was equally alarming to both. As yet they could do no more than patiently observe the progress of events. The presence of a formidable army, almost exclusively Roman Catholic, and the notorious

At page 422 of this latter work, it is stated that Houston was about to leave Scotland for Ireland, in the end of January, 1689. He probably came over shortly afterwards; as Walker, in his account of the siege of Derry (page 21), with the view of discrediting the Presbyterians generally, makes the following observation respecting him:—"Mr. Hewson was very troublesome, and would admit none to fight for the Protestant religion till they had first taken the Covenant." This statement, whether true or false, has been carefully retailed and applied to the Presbyterian ministers, as a body, by every compiler of the events of the siege, down to Charlotte Elizabeth, in her "Derry, a tale of the Revolution," who has improved upon it by adding, without the least authority (page 172), that Hewson was proved to be "a hired emissary of Tyrconnel!" The Rev. Mr. Boyse, of Dublin, in his "Vindication of Mr. Osborne," afterwards mentioned (see Note 33), thus replies to Walker's insidious observation:—"As for Mr. Hewson, whom Mr. Walker joyns with Mr. Osborne; I suppose he is not ignorant, that he was some years before publicly discarded by the N. C. ministers in the north for his scandalous and turbulent carriage, and therefore they do no more than right to themselves in disowning him. His narrow zeal that would suffer none to fight for the Protestant religion but such as would take the Covenant, was certainly very unseasonable as well as foolish bigotry. And I hope, as Mr. Walker spy'd this mote in Mr. Hewson's eye, he will not overlook the beam in their's, who are as zealous to exclude all from fighting for the same cause who comply not with their sacrament-test." [Walker's reference to Houston was perfectly gratuitous, as that individual was not in the city during the siege.]

partiality and corruption of the courts of law, rendered hopeless any attempt at resistance. "Ireland now exhibited a gloomy scene of oppression and dejection, of insolence and despair, of power exercised without decency, and injuries sustained without redress."<sup>17</sup> But the news of the landing of the Prince of Orange in England on the 4th of November, and the subsequent removal of the troops from Ulster to oppose his progress, inspired the northern Protestants with the hope of yet saving their country and their religion from impending ruin.

The Presbyterians were the first in the kingdom to hail the arrival of the prince. Before the end of the month in which he landed, the ministers and their principal hearers in Ulster empowered the Rev. Archibald Hamilton, minister of Armagh, and the Rev. Alexander Osborne, who had been minister of Brigh, in Tyrone, but who had recently accepted the charge of the congregation of Newmarket, in Dublin, to make choice of a person of zeal and prudence to wait, in their name, on his highness.<sup>18</sup> These leading ministers prevailed on a Presbyterian gentleman, Doctor Duncan Cumyng, who had settled as a physician in Dublin in the year 1684, to undertake this dangerous mission.<sup>19</sup> To him they gave the following written instructions, subscribed by them on behalf of their friends and brethren:—"1. That in our name you congratulate the arrival of the Prince of Orange into England, and his success hitherto in so glorious an undertaking to deliver these nations from Popery and slavery. 2. That you represent the dangers and fears of the Protestants in Ireland, and particularly in the province of Ulster; and humbly beseech him to take some speedy and effectual care for their preservation and relief. 3. That you represent our readiness to serve him and his interest in prosecution of so glorious a design, as far as we have access."<sup>20</sup> So early as the first week in December, he proceeded to England to lay these desires before the prince, then on his march to London. He had scarcely set out on his journey, when an incident occurred which roused the northern Protestants to a sense of their imminent danger, and constrained them to resort to active measures in their defence.

He was in Derry during the siege, and afterwards proceeded to London, where his "Narrative" was published early in the year 1690. He died at Cookstown in 1696, in the forty-ninth year of his age. I have seen a MS. volume of sermons preached by him in congregations in Derry, Tyrone, Armagh, and Down, during the year 1681, which prove him to have been a learned, orthodox, and pious divine.

On the 3rd of December, an anonymous letter, addressed to the Earl of Mount-Alexander, was dropped in the streets of Comber, in the county of Down, purporting to warn his lordship, as a particular friend of the writer, that a general massacre of the Protestants had been planned by the Irish, to take effect on the following Sunday. Similar letters were addressed to Mr. Brown, of Lisburn, and Mr. Maitland, of Hillsborough, and were dispersed through the neighbouring towns. Copies were immediately despatched to Dublin by Mr. Upton, of Templepatrick, and by Sir William Franklin, the second husband of the Countess of Donegall, then residing in the castle of Belfast. In this emergency, the first persons who were consulted were the Presbyterian ministers of the adjoining parishes in Down and Antrim, who did not hesitate to urge their people to associate and arm themselves, as a necessary precaution for the protection of their lives and properties. Mr. Cunningham, of Belfast, had forwarded a copy of this anonymous letter to Mr. Canning, at Garvagh, and, through

Colonel Philips, of Newtownlimavady, it reached Derry on the evening of Thursday, the 6th of December.

The troops which had occupied this important garrison had been recently removed to Dublin, and the inhabitants were expecting the arrival of a regiment known to be exclusively composed of Catholics, and commanded by a Catholic nobleman, Alexander, Earl of Antrim, whose brother had acted so conspicuous a part in the late rebellion. Such was the state of affairs when the intelligence of the apprehended massacre reached the city. On the following day, the Rev. James Gordon, Presbyterian minister of Clondermot, a parish adjoining Derry, advised the inhabitants to shut the gates, and exclude this obnoxious regiment from the garrison. But the bishop, Dr. Ezekiel Hopkins, on being consulted, strenuously opposed this bold and hazardous measure; and, in common with the majority of the Episcopalian clergy, inculcated the necessity of non-resistance. The alarm, however, during this eventful day was so great, and the rumours of the massacre, though unfounded, were so frequent, that the people could be no longer restrained; and in the afternoon several young men of the city, most of them Presbyterians,* took forcible possession of the keys, and closed the gates against the Earl of Antrim's "redshanks," just preparing to enter. Though earnestly entreated by the bishop and the more grave and prudent portion of the inhabitants to desist from so rash an enterprise, these resolute youths, supported by the great body of the population, steadily maintained the ground they had taken.<sup>21</sup> On this sudden and apparently unimportant movement the fate of the three kingdoms ultimately depended. Had Derry been occupied by a Popish garrison, the armies of James would have possessed the whole of Ulster, and thence passed without obstruction into Scotland, where, united to the forces of Claverhouse, Viscount Dundee, they would have made an easy conquest of that kingdom, and afterwards invaded England with accumulated strength. But this important post was thus, at a most critical moment, providentially preserved, to be the means of defeating the machinations of a despot and a bigot against the religion and liberties of Britain.

The inhabitants of Enniskillen, the only other fortified place in the north-west of the province, having, like those of Derry, received similar warning, adopted a similar resolution. Though deserted by their magistrates, they resolved to shut their gates against the Romish troops which Tyrconnel had despatched to occupy their garrison. In this decisive step they were especially countenanced and encouraged by the Rev. Robert Kelso, Presbyterian minister there, who, like the rest of his brethren throughout Ulster, "laboured both publicly and privately in animating his hearers to take up arms and stand upon their own defence, showing example himself by wearing arms and marching at the head of them when together."<sup>22</sup> On the 15th of December, by a letter from Mr. Kelso, and another from a few of the town's people, they informed their brethren in Derry of their critical circumstances, and entreated their counsel and co-operation. Supported by a company of horsemen, composed of the Protestant tenantry of Major Gustavus Hamilton, the inhabitants a few days afterwards boldly attacked the Romish companies on their march towards the town, and completely routed them. They thus gained time, which they diligently employed in placing their garrison in a better posture, and otherwise providing for the future defence of that part of the province.<sup>23</sup>

Though the alarm of a massacre soon subsided, many causes conspired to compel the Protestants throughout Ulster to continue their defensive preparations. Tyrconnel was rapidly augmenting his army by forced levies from the Catholic population; and these half-civilised and half-disciplined recruits began to plunder the Protestants of their arms and horses, while no redress for these insolent outrages could be obtained from any quarter. Their immediate safety and protection, therefore, as well as the prospect of remoter dangers, required them to lose no time in having recourse to additional precautions. The first step taken by the gentlemen of the several counties was to form themselves into Protestant associations. These bodies elected councils of war, and a commander-in-chief or general for each county; and a general council of union was appointed to sit at Hillsborough for the whole of the associated counties of Ulster. The county of Down, on the 7th of January, commissioned the Earl of Mount-Alexander, Sir Arthur Rawdon, of Moira, Mr. Hamilton, of Bangor,* and Mr. Hamilton of Tullymore,† to whom Sir Robert Colville was afterwards added, to be their standing council, and Lord Mount-Alexander to be their general.<sup>24</sup> About the same time the gentry of the county of Antrim, to the number of thirty-five, met at Lord Massareene's, at Antrim, and chose for their council Sir William Franklin, of Belfast, Mr. Arthur Upton, of Templepatrick, Mr. Davis, of Carrickfergus, Mr. Harrison, from beside Lisburn, and Mr. Shaw, of the Bush, near Antrim, and for their general, Mr. Clotworthy Skeffington, Lord Massareene's son.<sup>25</sup> The county of Armagh elected Sir Nicholas Acheson, with Captains Pointz and Middleton, and, in conjunction with Monaghan, commissioned Lord Blaney to be their commander-in chief; and the counties of Derry, Donegal, and Tyrone, appointed to the same office Colonel Lundy and Major Gustavus Hamilton. The supreme council for Ulster was composed of Mr. Upton for Antrim, Captain Pointz for Armagh, Mr. Cunningham for Derry, Mr. Johnston for Monaghan, and Mr. Hamilton, of Tullymore, for Down; and the Earl of Mount-Alexander was appointed president. These councils collected voluntary contributions and nominated officers, who, at their own cost and hazard, raised men and organised regiments; while the Presbyterian ministers exerted themselves with the utmost zeal and success to induce their people to enrol themselves in the ranks. Lords Mount-Alexander and Blaney, Sir Arthur Rawdon, and Mr. Skeffington, each raised a regiment of horse. In Down, four regiments of foot were raised by Sir John Macgill, Sir Robert Colville, Mr. Hamilton, of Tullymore, and Mr. Hamilton, of Bangor; Captain

Lord Claneboy, and consequently first cousin of "James of Bangor." The Earl of Roden is lineally descended from him.—The Hamilton Manuscripts, pp. 63—165].

<sup>24</sup> This was Hugh, the second Lord Mount-Alexander, son of the Lord Montgomery of the Ards, who is so frequently mentioned in the former part of this volume. He was born at Newtownards, February 24, 1650, and died at Mount-Alexander, near Comber, February 12, 1716.

<sup>25</sup> The Antrim Association immediately published a DECLARATION, explanatory of their reasons for uniting together, which was signed by Lord Massareene and twenty-two gentlemen of the county.—Mackenzie, p. 52.

Francis Annesley also collected a small body of horse and foot in the barony of Kinelearty. In Antrim, the same number of regiments were raised by Sir William Franklin, Mr. Upton, Mr. Leslie, of Ballymoney, and Mr. Adair, of Ballymena; another was raised in the vicinity of Lisburn for Captain Leighton, and three hundred foot were embodied by Colonel Edmonstone, of Broadisland, with part of which he garrisoned his house at Red Hall, near Carrickfergus. Colonel Francis Hamilton in Armagh, Colonel Hugh Montgomery in Fermanagh, and Colonel Hamill, of Lifford, in Donegal, with several other gentlemen, organised regiments in their respective counties.<sup>26</sup>

Immediately after their appointment, the general council at Hillsborough, in the second week of January, despatched Captain Baldwin Leighton with an address to the Prince of Orange, informing him of their grievances, and the measures which they had adopted for their own defence, and assuring him of their ardent attachment to the cause of constitutional freedom. Shortly afterwards the several Presbyteries, ever foremost in this good cause, agreed to hold a special meeting of the general committee, for the purpose of appointing two of their number to proceed to England with a similar address from their body to the prince, and to lay the desires of the Ulster Presbyterians before the English convention then about to meet. This committee, or synod of delegates, accordingly met at Connor, near Ballymena, on Tuesday, the 22nd of January. Out of a leet of five of the more influential ministers, they selected the Rev. Patrick Adair, of Belfast, and the Rev. John Abernethy, of Moneymore, as their commissioners; and they cheerfully assessed themselves to the amount of nearly one hundred pounds, to bear the expenses of these brethren while engaged in this important mission.<sup>27</sup>

Tyrconnel, distracted in his councils and uncertain what course to pursue, had not yet despatched any troops to secure the northern garrisons against the rising power of the Protestant associations. As yet, the latter had obtained a footing in three towns only—to wit, Enniskillen, Derry, and Coleraine; Newry, Charlemont, and Armagh, were in the exclusive possession of the lord-lieutenant's forces. Belfast and Lisburn were occupied by Sir Thomas Newcomen's regiment, composed partly of Romanists and partly of Protestants; and Carrickfergus, which still continued to be the strongest post in the north-east of Ulster, was held by a small and insufficient garrison. The troops previously stationed in it had been, on the 2nd of December, marched to Dublin, under the governor, Captain George Talbot, on their way to oppose the Prince of Orange in England, and their place had been supplied by three companies belonging to one of the newly-raised and undisciplined regiments, under Magennis of Iveagh.<sup>28</sup> In this state of affairs, the northern Protestants, having already crossed the Rubicon, and incurred the vengeance of Tyrconnel, dared not remain inactive. Being as yet only partially armed, their first project was to seize the arms belonging to Newcomen's regiment, with the view of attacking the inefficient garrison of Carrickfergus. For this purpose preparations were made by Sir Arthur Rawdon and Sir John Macgill, and the arms of part of the regiment, quartered at Lisburn, were actually seized by Captain Obrey and others; but Mr. Hamilton, of Tullymore, and some of the gentlemen of Belfast, conceiving the further prosecution of this attempt inexpedient, until their plans for future proceedings were better matured, unhappily abandoned it. Sir Thomas Newcomen immediately took the alarm, barricaded the streets of Lisburn, and apprized the governor of Carrickfergus of the projected attempt on that place. Its garrison was forthwith strengthened by the addition of the Earl of Antrim's regiment which had retired from Derry, and by part of Colonel Cormack O'Neill's; and the whole was placed under the command of Colonel Mark Talbot, an illegitimate son of Tyrconnel.<sup>29</sup> The Protestants though disappointed were not disheartened. On the contrary they became more confident and powerful as their scheme of association took effect throughout the province. In Armagh, the inhabitants disarmed a troop of dragoons, and a Protestant garrison was established there under Lord Blaney; who, in the beginning of February, secured the pass at Loughbrickland, and was engaged in almost daily skirmishes with the Romish garrisons at Newry and Charlemont.<sup>30</sup> Not long after, the supreme council, conceiving themselves in a capacity to attack Carrickfergus, resolved to make the attempt. Having apprised some of the Protestant inhabitants of their design, they sent from Belfast, on the night of the 21st of February, a thousand men, under the command of Lieutenant-Colonel Bremichan and Major Baker, afterwards governor of Derry, with the view of surprising the garrison; but owing to the badness of the way and the inclemency of the night, it was after sunrise when they appeared before the town. The garrison was soon in such a posture of defence as to render hopeless any attempt from without. Lord Mount-Alexander and Sir Arthur Rawdon, with several troops of horse, having joined the infantry before the town, a parley was effected, and the hostile parties agreed upon certain stipulations for the removal of their mutual jealousies, and resolved to transmit to Tyrconnel an account of their agreement. Unfortunately for the Protestants, one O'Haggerty, a friar, on the recommendation of Mr. Randal Brice, of Lisburn,* was appointed to carry this joint communication to Dublin. Through this messenger Tyrconnel, for the first time, became acquainted with the real state of the Protestant forces in that part of Ulster. These were much less numerous and efficient than he had been led to believe. They were, in truth, still very partially armed and imperfectly trained; their numbers were not great, and they were widely scattered; their officers were inexperienced, and their supplies of arms, ammunition, and provisions wholly inadequate to the exigencies of their situation. They had calculated too much on the tardiness or fears of Tyrconnel, and on the certainty of receiving support from England before he would venture to march against them. But no sooner had he learned their real condition from the observant friar, than he resolved to despatch the flower of his army to Ulster, to disperse their associations and reduce them to subjection.<sup>31</sup> As a preparatory step, he issued a proclamation, dated the 7th March, offering pardon to all who should lay down their arms and submit to his government, with the exception of ten of the leading Protestants of Ulster, and threatening those who rejected this offer with the penalties of high treason; and privately intimating the probabilities of another massacre by the hands of the ungovernable rabble of the Irish Romanists.<sup>32</sup>

The first notice which the northern Protestants received of Tyrconnel's determination was through the medium of the Rev. Alexander Osborne, already mentioned as one of the Presbyterian ministers of Dublin. Since the landing of the Prince of Orange in England, he had maintained a regular correspondence with his brethren in various parts of Ulster, and by letters in cypher had informed them of the proceedings of the deputy, and the progress of affairs in the sister kingdoms. Finding, however, the communication with the north both by sea and land entirely cut off, from the beginning of March, and fearing the cause in Ulster would be ruined through want of timely notice of the impending invasion, he availed himself of an offer of the deputy to employ him in conveying a message to the leaders of the northern association, that he might have an opportunity of apprising his friends in the fullest manner of their imminent danger, and of putting them on their guard against the artifices of Tyrconnel to induce them to lay down their arms. For this purpose he left Dublin on the 7th of March, and, though pursued by a party of marauding Irish near Newry, he arrived at Loughbrickland in safety on the second day afterwards. From this place he wrote to Lord Mount-Alexander, Sir Arthur Rawdon, and others, informing them of Tyrconnel's proposals, but prudently withholding his opinion of the course they ought to pursue, till he should "fully discourse with them in person."

The following were the persons excepted from pardon:—Lords Mount-Alexander, Massareene, and Kingston; Sirs Robert Colville, Arthur Rawdon, and John Macgill; with Clothworthy Skeffington, John Hawkins, Robert Sanderson, and Francis Hamilton, son to Sir Charles Hamilton. The author of this "Answer" to King was the Rev. Charles Leslie, second son of John Leslie, bishop of Raphoe, and afterwards of Clogher. He was educated at Enniskillen school, and was a graduate of Trinity College. In 1687 he was made chancellor of Connor, but he mostly resided on his property at Glaslough, in the county of Monaghan, where he held several public disputations, in 1687—88, with Romish priests, in the neighbouring churches of Monaghan and Tynan. He was the head of the Irish non-juring clergy, and refused to take the oaths to William and Mary. He followed the fortunes of James II., and his son, the Pretender, but returned to Ireland in 1721, and died at Glaslough in the month of March following. He wrote many standard theological works, among which his "Short and Easy Method with the Deists" is at once the most popular and the most profound.—"Biog. Brit."

The general council accordingly met at Hillsborough; and on Tuesday, the 12th, Mr. Osborne had an interview with them. He strenuously urged them to reject the insidious offers of the deputy; and the council unanimously concurring with him, he transmitted to Dublin a letter to that effect.<sup>33</sup> They were encouraged the more to return this decided answer by the arrival of Captain Leighton, a few days previously, with a letter from the Prince of Orange, dated the 10th of February, and addressed "To the Earl of Mount-Alexander, to be communicated to the Protestant nobility and gentry in the north of Ireland," approving of their conduct, and promising them speedy and effectual support. On receiving this communication they immediately proclaimed King William and Queen Mary in all the towns subject to their authority, with the usual demonstrations of joy, not unmingled with anxious anticipations of the approaching conflict, now wholly inevitable.<sup>34</sup>

In this emergency the Presbyterian ministers of the neighbouring parishes, desirous of assisting to the utmost of their power in the defence of their country, waited on the general council, or CONSULT, as it was sometimes called, and the

<sup>33</sup> Walker, in his "True Account of the Siege of Londonderry," manifestly written under strong prejudices against the Presbyterians, described Mr. Osborne as "a spy upon the whole north, employed by the Lord Tyrconnel;" and, with the view of supporting this malicious and unfounded charge, he published in his Appendix a copy of the letter in which Mr. Osborne had communicated Tyrconnel's proposals to the leaders of the northern association. This gratuitous attack called forth a triumphant reply from the Rev. J. Boyse, of Dublin, already mentioned (see Note 8, which he entitled, "A Vindication of the Reverend Mr. Alexander Osborne, in reference to the affairs of the North of Ireland; in which some mistakes concerning him in the printed account of the siege of Derry, &c., are rectified. And a brief relation of those affairs is given, so far as Mr. Osborne and other N. C. ministers in the North were concerned in 'em. Written at Mr. Osborne's request by his friend, Mr. J. Boyse." following memorandum of their conference has been happily preserved:—"On the 14th of March, about nine Presbyterian ministers came to such of the consult as were then present at Hillsborough.<sup>35</sup> They apologised for their offering their advice in such affairs, which nothing but a deep sense of the common danger and distress of that great body of Protestants, whereof they were members, could have put them upon. The consult received them very kindly, and desired them to proceed. They then acquainted them that there were in their several parishes many able men, fit for military service, who had arms and were not yet listed in the army, and yet were very willing to venture their lives for King William and Queen Mary and the Protestant religion. They, therefore, proposed, if the consult approved it, that they would presently repair to their several parishes, and admonish all men in their limits between sixteen and sixty, that could bear arms, to meet and rendezvous on such day and place as the consult shall think fit, with such arms as they could procure and ten days' provision with them. For they found by the information of their brother, Mr. Osborne, that the Lord Tyrconnel's army would certainly attack them on the refusal of his proposals—which proposals they could by no means advise them to comply with, but rather advised them to make a vigorous and resolute defence. To this advice, those of the consult then present readily assented, and presently employed clerks to write orders for summoning the county to meet at Blaris-moore, on the Tuesday following, being the 19th! Upon which the said ministers resolved to repair to their several parishes, to encourage and excite the people to meet at the day appointed, declaring their purpose also to come to the field with them. They also further

<sup>35</sup> These ministers were the Rev. Messrs. Archibald Hamilton, of Bangor; Alexander Osborne, of Dublin; Henry Livingston, of Drumbo; William Legatt, of Dromore; Alexander Gordon, of Rathfriland; Alexander Glass, of Dunmurry; George Lang, of Loughbrickland; Alexander M'Cracken, of Lisburn; and Patrick Adair, of Belfast. advised that the next Monday, being the 18th, should be appointed as a public day of prayer and fasting to implore the assistance and blessing of God on their undertaking ; which was unanimously agreed to, and the said ministers drew up reasons to be read in their several congregations for that purpose."<sup>36</sup>

These plans, however, were frustrated by the approach of the army from Dublin ; the horse commanded by Colonel Dominick Sheldon, and the foot by Lieutenant-General Richard Hamilton, a Roman Catholic officer, the fifth son of Sir George Hamilton, of Donalong, in Tyrone. On Monday, the 11th of March, the main body of the Irish, to the number of fifteen thousand, arrived at Newry. Sir Arthur Rawdon was stationed at Loughbrickland to watch their movements ; but the council, being unable to send him a reinforcement, directed him to withdraw his garrison from that town and from Rathfriland, and to fall back to Dromore. At the same time the Protestant inhabitants, unwilling to trust to the protections issued by Tyrconnel, abandoned these towns, and with scanty supplies of money and clothing, hastily packed up, they burned their stores of forage lest they should fall into the hands of the enemy, and withdrew, some to Belfast, and others to the coast, for the purpose of escaping into Scotland or England. Dromore now became the temporary rendezvous of the Protestant forces. Hither Captain Hugh Macgill led his troop of dragoons from the Ards, and Major Baker followed with four companies of foot. Expresses were despatched by Sir Arthur Rawdon in various directions for additional reinforcements, and to Hillsborough for arms and ammunition ; but the rapid movements of the Irish general defeated these attempts to concentrate their strength at any one place. On the morning of the 14th, Sir Arthur sent out scouts to ascertain the progress of the enemy ; and learning that a few troops only of dragoons were approaching,<sup>37</sup> he posted his foot under Major Baker in the street of Dromore, and pushed his horse forward to reconnoitre the Irish. But the main body of the enemy appearing, the horse hastily retreated, and were hotly pursued into the town; the foot immediately gave way and fled; many of the inhabitants were killed while endeavouring to carry off some remnants of their property; although Lord Mount-Alexander, Colonel Upton, and others, marched to their support from Hillsborough, they were unable to rally their undisciplined levies, and a general and confused flight, which has been usually styled the "Break of Dromore," and in which many were slain, was the unavoidable result. The castle at Hillsborough, in which were deposited a thousand pounds in money, a large quantity of oatmeal and other stores, with the papers of the general council of Ulster, fell into the hands of Hamilton.<sup>38</sup>

This decided victory, which opened to the Irish army the whole of the north-east of Ulster, and the arrival of King James at Kinsale, a few days previously, so discouraged many of the Protestant leaders, that they either abandoned the country, or accepted protections from the Irish general.<sup>39</sup> Sir Arthur Rawdon, however, and a few others, resolved to defend their country to the last extremity. Their scattered forces of horse and foot, when collected, amounted to no more than about four thousand men. Of the horse, there were only two troops of Lord Mount-Alexander's regiment, under Major Stroud and Captain Clotworthy Upton, with one troop from Belfast, under Captain White. Of the foot, there were forthcoming Sir Arthur's own regiment, Sir John Macgill's regiment,

under Lieutenant-Colonel Whitney, part of Sir William Franklin's regiment, under Major Tubman, Colonel Upton, with the greater part of his regiment, and Lieutenant-Colonel Edmonstone, of Broadisland, at the head of Colonel Adair's regiment.<sup>40</sup> Abandoning Belfast and Antrim, in which the Irish army obtained great plunder, Sir Arthur Rawdon, in command of this force, retreated towards Coleraine, where he arrived on Friday, the 15th of March, having broken down the bridge at Portglenone, and ordered all the boats on the river Bann to be burned, to prevent the enemy from passing over into the county of Derry.<sup>41</sup>

On the western side of Lough Neagh, the Protestant forces were not more successful than they had been on the eastern. The Romanists held possession of Charlemont, in which was stationed a formidable body of nearly three thousand men. To serve as a check on this fort, the town of Dungannon was garrisoned by a considerable force, the horse under Captain Stewart, of Killymoon,<sup>42</sup> and the foot under Colonel Stewart, the governor of the town, who had several skirmishes with the enemy at Stewartstown and Benburb. Lord Blaney at Armagh continued to protect that part of the country from the marauding incursions of the Irish. But while one portion of King James's army were advancing from Newry towards Dromore, as already mentioned, another portion had proceeded from Ardee towards Monaghan, having plundered Lord Blaney's house at Castleblaney, and compelled his lady, with the

A servant of Lord Massereene, for a bribe of ten guineas, discovered to the Irish plunderers money and plate to the amount of between three and four thousand pounds, concealed at his lordship's castle at Antrim, which was also rifled of all its valuable furniture.

<sup>42</sup> Among the horse was a small squadron under Colonel John Forward, of Castleforward, in the Lagan; of whom see Chapter XVIII., Note 50. When Lord Massereene and the Bishops of Derry and Raphoe sailed from Derry to England, shortly after the shutting of the gates, he purchased their horses, and proceeded to Dungannon, at the head of two or three hundred men. scattered forces in that neighbourhood, to seek refuge in Glasslough. So soon as Lord Blaney was informed of these movements, and of Sir Arthur Rawdon's retreat from Loughbrickland towards Dromore, he directed the Protestant companies at Glasslough to proceed to Antrim, by way of Toome, where he intended to unite with them in forming a junction with Sir Arthur Rawdon, and opposing their combined strength to the main body of the Irish under Hamilton. With some difficulty the Protestants succeeded in effecting their retreat from Glasslough, after a sharp encounter with the Romanists under Colonel Mackenna, in which Captain Matthew Anketell, a gentleman of Monaghan, and a brave and gallant officer, was unhappily slain. But news arriving of the break of Dromore, the dispersion of the north-eastern forces, and the retreat of Sir Arthur Rawdon to Coleraine, Lord Blaney was reluctantly compelled to abandon Dungannon and Armagh; and, instead of marching towards Toome, to proceed directly to Coleraine with his disheartened followers, reduced from eighteen hundred to not more than three hundred horse and as many foot. An attempt was made, by a body of twelve hundred men from the forts of Charlemont and Mountjoy, to intercept him on his march, at the bridge of Ardtrea, between Dungannon and Moneymore. But having fortunately gained this pass, only a quarter of an hour before them, he boldly attacked them as they approached, and compelled them to retreat with the loss of above one hundred men. He then retired unmolested, on the 16th of March, to Coleraine; and at the same time Lady Blaney, with the forces from Glasslough, succeeded in reaching Derry in safety.<sup>43</sup> A small body of Protestants, consisting of seven companies under Captain Henry Hunter, of Colonel Francis Hamilton's regiment, who had been stationed at Markethill, and had rescued the town of 'Trandragee from being plundered by a troop of Lord Kingsland's dragoons, were compelled to retreat on the eastern side of Lough Neagh, through Lurgan and Glenavy; but on their way to Antrim they were surrounded by a large body of Lord Dungan's horse, and compelled to lay down their arms: The men were dismissed under an engagement not to take up arms against King James; but Hunter, refusing to make such a promise, was detained and cast into prison,<sup>44</sup>

Coleraine was now occupied by a considerable body of troops under Major Gustavus Hamilton, as governor; but their supply of ammunition was scanty, and the town very imperfectly fortified. On three sides it was surrounded by a mud wall protected by a wet ditch, and on the remaining side by the river Bann, over which was thrown a temporary drawbridge. The Irish forces occupied in plunder, advanced very slowly from Belfast. It was not until Saturday, the 23rd of March, nine days after the break of Dromore, that General Hamilton arrived at Ballymoney. Here he formed an encampment, and rested his troops for a few days.<sup>45</sup> On the Wednesday following he appeared before Coleraine, with the main body of his army, and, supported by some artillery, made a vigorous assault upon the town. But it was so gallantly defended, that, in the evening, under cover of a heavy fall of snow, he withdrew his forces to Ballymoney, and being as yet unable to cross the Bann, he sent several detachments to quarter at Ballymena and Antrim.

Intelligence having been received at Coleraine on the following day that the north-western division of the Irish army, under Lord Galmoy, were marching from Armagh to effect a junction with Hamilton, arrangements were promptly made by the governor for securing the several passes on the river Bann. Retaining for the defence of the town a body of three thousand men, consisting of the regiments of Sir Tristram Beresford, Colonel Francis Hamilton and others, he ordered Sir Arthur Rawdon's regiment to occupy Moneymore, and its strong castle belonging to the Clotworthy family. Colonel Cunningham was despatched with his regiment to Magherafelt; Colonel Skeffington occupied Bellaghy and Castledawson, placing one detachment of his regiment under Lieutenant-Colonel Houston at Toome, and another under Major Mitchellburne at Newferry. Colonel Edmonstone, with part of Adair's regiment, was directed to secure the pass at Portglenone, and prevent the enemy from repairing the bridge; and Sir John Macgill's regiment, under Lieutenant-Colonel Whitney, took possession of Kilrea. Thus a line of communication and defence was established along the entire course of the lower Bann, which cut off all communication between Galmoy in Tyrone and Hamilton in Antrim, and prevented their proposed junction. During the first week of April no collision occurred between the parties. But early in the morning of Sunday, the 7th of that month, a strong body of Hamilton's forces, under Colonel Nugent, son of the Earl of Westmeath, having secured some boats, succeeded in crossing the Bann about a mile from Portglenone, without alarming the Protestant sentinels. Nugent immediately attacked Colonel Edmonstone, who had thrown up some entrenchments, and who, trusting to his guards along the river, was not expecting an attack from that quarter. The trenches were defended with great bravery by Edmonstone and his lieutenant-colonel, Shaw, supported by Sir Arthur Rawdon, who happened to be in the neighbourhood, and by five companies from Kilrea, under Lieutenant-Colonel Whitney. But Captain James Macgill being killed, and another officer desperately wounded, while the number of the Irish crossing the river was continually augmenting, and intelligence also arriving that Lord Galmoy had advanced to Moneymore, it was deemed inexpedient to prolong the contest. The Protestant forces, accordingly, effecting their retreat over the mountains towards Derry; Coleraine was abandoned and the bridge destroyed; the terrified inhabitants followed the army, bringing with them what provisions they could; and, to cripple the resources of the enemy, the whole country from the Bann to the Foyle was burned and laid waste.<sup>46</sup> General Hamilton immediately took possession of Coleraine, repaired the bridge, and placed in it a strong garrison, under the command of Colonel O'Morra, or Moore.<sup>47</sup>

The small but fortified city of Derry was the only refuge that remained to the Protestants of Ulster, and every preparation was now made by their enemies to wrest it from them. King James, who had arrived in Dublin in the end of March, set out for the north on the 8th of April, at the head of twelve thousand men and a considerable train of artillery. On the following day he arrived at Armagh; thence he proceeded to visit the garrisons at Dungannon and Charlemont, where he spent a few days. He reached Omagh on the 14th,<sup>48</sup> and from this place he sent forward his troops to force the passage of the river Finn, above Strabane, at the bridge of Clady, in order to gain the side of the Foyle on which Derry is situated. Through the traitorous neglect of the noted Lundy, the Protestant forces stationed at this important pass, being unsupported, were compelled to give way. A few days afterwards, King James and his army advanced to St. Johnston, within five miles of Derry, and immediately placed the city in a state of blockade. The progress of events during this memorable siege, which dates its commencement from the 18th of April, is so well known, that the more remarkable incidents alone need be noticed. The first movement of Lundy and his council was to take steps for the surrender of the town to King James, and articles for this purpose were actually drawn up. But the great body of the soldiers and the inhabitants, headed by a gallant Presbyterian officer, Captain Adam Murray,* were so indignant at this base proposal of a surrender, that the project was defeated, and Lundy was compelled to fly from the town in disguise. The resolute men of Derry now prepared for an obstinate defence of their city. Major Baker and the Rev. George Walker, of Donoughmore, near Dungannon, were chosen joint governors, the one in the military and the other in the civil department. The garrison was found to consist of about seven thousand men and three hundred and fifty officers, who were formed into eight regiments, and appointed to their respective stations on the walls and bastions. An accurate account was taken of the provisions and other stores, and above a thousand of the aged and infirm, with women and children, took protections and retired from the town.

Seventeen Episcopalian clergymen, mostly curates, and eight Presbyterian ministers, remained in the city.<sup>49</sup> Of the colonels and field-officers, the majority were Episcopalians, but by far the smaller number of the captains and inferior officers were of that persuasion; while among the soldiers and inhabitants there were fifteen Presbyterians for one Episcopalian. Though this proportion is somewhat reduced by the High Church writers, yet all accounts concur in representing an overwhelming majority of the defenders of Derry as members of the Presbyterian Church<sup>50</sup> The cathedral, being the only place of worship within the walls,<sup>51</sup> was occupied by both parties on the Sabbath—the Episcopalians in the morning, and the Presbyterians afterwards; “the latter, entering at twelve, had two sermons there every afternoon, besides two or three other meetings in other parts of the city. In their assemblies there were, every Lord’s-day, considerable collections for the relief of the poor people and the sick and wounded soldiers, who had otherwise perisht for any care was taken of them; and they had the use of the cathedral every Thursday.”<sup>52</sup> After the

<sup>51</sup> It appears that the Presbyterians of Derry, in 1672, had commenced to build a place of worship in the city, but that the bishop, Dr. Robert Mossom, opposed its erection; as, in August of that year, I find Alderman John Craigie, an elder from Derry, stating to the Presbytery, “that the late difference between the bishop and them was referred to his majesty by the lord-lieutenant, and that they were advised to forbear their meeting-house within the walls, until his majesty’s pleasure were known.” (MS. Min. of Pres.) They were subsequently obliged to build their house in the suburbs, which was of course destroyed at the investment of the city.

<sup>52</sup> Mackenzie, p. 32. The rise and progress of historical error may be seen, on a small scale, in the successive accounts which have been given respecting the use of the Derry cathedral by the two religious parties in the city. Mackenzie merely says—“that there might be a good understanding and harmony among the besieged, it was agreed to by Governor Baker that the Conformists should have the cathedral church one-half of the Lord’s-day, and the Nonconformists the other half.” So Sir John Dalrymple, referring solely to this statement, and possessing no additional means of information, embellishes it by saying—(“Mem. of Gt. Brit.,” &c., vol. i., part 2, p. 39)—“The Conformists and Nonconformists insisted each to have possession of the cathedral, nor could mutual slaughter have been prevented, had it not been agreed, that the one class should attend service in the forenoon, the other in the afternoon.” The reader will at once perceive the several unauthorised assertions which are here introduced; but how will he be surprised at the next improvement to which Mackenzie’s plain and simple statement is subjected? The Rev. J. Graham, resting exclusively on Dalrymple’s authority, tells us (“Hist. of Siege of Derry,” p. 128), that “the Conformists and Nonconformists were drawn up in the Diamond to fight for the cathedral church.” Here a precise locality and a formal appeal to arms in military array are gratuitously furnished, so that, having now gotten the place, all we want to garnish the narrative is the time. This is supplied in the next improved version that has been published—to wit, by the authoress of “Derry, a tale of the Revolution,” formerly referred to (see Note 16), who presents us with the following circumstantial detail of an affair which owed its existence entirely to the rhetorical diction of Dalrymple:—“A short time before, in that very place, the Diamond, two parties, Episcopalian and Presbyterian, had actually arrayed completion of these arrangements, no event of importance occurred during the remainder of the month of April, with the exception of two vigorous and successful sallies under Adam Murray, now a colonel, who slew the Marquis de Maumon, a favourite general that had accompanied James from France. To counterbalance this loss, the fort of Culmore was, two days afterwards, surrendered by Captain William Adair to General Hamilton, who immediately placed in it a strong garrison, and cut off all communication with the city by water.<sup>53</sup>

In the meantime, the Protestants of Down made a vigorous attempt to preserve their properties from being plundered by the Romanist soldiery. The protections which many of them had received from Tyrconnel and General Hamilton were disregarded by the military; especially by the regiment of Magennis of Iveagh, whose companies composed of rude and half-civilised natives from the mountains of Mourne, were stationed in the several towns. Their unauthorised and oppressive exactions were for a time borne in silence, the people having few arms, and being destitute of a leader; but hearing that Captain Henry Hunter had escaped from Antrim, themselves to fight for the privilege of respectively using the cathedral as a place of worship." Page 171. How different from Mackenzie's narrative! How fallacious to depend on secondary authorities!

<sup>53</sup> The articles of capitulation in this case are preserved in a valuable collection of MSS., in seven folio volumes, recently purchased by the Royal Irish Academy, and deposited in their library. They relate to the "reduction of Ireland," and extend from 1689 to 1691. The most interesting portion consists of a series of orders or letters from James II. to General Hamilton, during the siege of Derry, which were found with the latter when he was taken prisoner at the battle of the Boyne. These orders are all originals, signed by James's own hand, and countersigned in due form by Lord Melfort, his secretary of state, and they bespeak his extreme anxiety to obtain possession of the city, which Hamilton, in July, frankly told him it was impossible to effect, except by famine. Culmore was surrendered on the 23rd of April, and the capitulation is signed by Captain William Adair, of Ballymena, Richard Johnson, and Benjamin Adair. In the "True and Impartial Account," &c., it is stated that James's emissaries had tampered with the garrison, and so induced them to surrender, and Captain Ash, in his "Journal," makes a similar statement; but there is no need to impute any treachery, as it was physically impossible that so small a fort, with a mere breastwork of sods, could withstand the force with which James would have attacked it, had it not been surrendered.

where he had been confined for nearly three weeks, and had reached Donaghadee, with the view of passing over into Scotland, they had recourse to this experienced officer for counsel and assistance. He immediately abandoned his design of leaving the kingdom, placed himself at the head of the Protestants who had arms, and marched towards Newtownards, which the company of Captain Con Magennis were just preparing to plunder. On the 15th of April he attacked this party at a place called Kinningbourne, about two miles from the town, and having made prisoners of the greater number, he drove them out of that district. On the same day he dispersed a second party of this obnoxious regiment, stationed at Comber, and rescued that town also from their exactions. Thence, with an increased number of adherents, he proceeded to the Ards, where another large detachment from the same regiment, having crossed over at Strangford from their head-quarters at Downpatrick, were engaged in plundering the unprotected Protestants of that barony. These he likewise defeated, and compelled them to retreat across the ferry in such haste, that they left behind them in Portaferry all their plunder, together with several vessels laden with grain, which they had seized not long before.<sup>54</sup>

So soon as intelligence of these proceedings reached Carrickfergus, Lieutenant-Colonel Mark Talbot, the governor, at the head of a small body of an hundred musketeers, marched towards Newtownards; but hearing of the dispersion of the detachment in the Ards, and the increasing number of the Protestants who had risen in arms, he hastily retreated to his quarters. From Portaferry Hunter returned to Comber, where he received repeated messages from Sir Robert Maxwell, then residing in the castle of Killileagh,<sup>55</sup> urging him to assist in expelling Captain Savage's company that had been recently quartered upon the inhabitants of that town, and had threatened to take possession of the castle. Hunter accordingly marched during the night to Killileagh, and entered it at daybreak; and, having surprised and disarmed the entire company, he sent the captain and lieutenant prisoners to Portaferry, to be shipped to England or the Isle of Man. Magennis, irritated at these repeated discomfitures, and especially at the disgraceful capture of his company under Savage, proceeded with a considerable force from Downpatrick towards Killileagh, with the view of rescuing his officers and men, and checking the further progress of Hunter. But the latter was on the alert, and boldly advanced against him. Both parties met at the Quoile Bridge, and after a smart skirmish, Magennis was compelled to abandon Downpatrick, and retreat over the strand to Dundrum, leaving the Protestants in possession of that district. Hunter secured a small piece of ordnance, which he placed in Killileagh castle, and proceeded to Downpatrick, where he liberated all persons confined for political offences.<sup>56</sup> By these unexpected successes the people of Down experienced a seasonable relief from the exactions of the soldiery; the embargo which had been laid on vessels in the seaport towns of that county was removed, and many persons from the remoter parts of the province effected their escape into the sister kingdoms; the garrison in Derry were encouraged by the intelligence of these proceedings; and greater leniency and moderation were thenceforth observed by the Romanist authorities in other places, lest a similar spirit of revolt should be excited.

But this triumph of the Protestants was of short duration. On the 23rd of April, a few days after their last encounter with Magennis, King James arrived at Newry, on his return to Dublin from the camp before Derry. Alarmed at the progress of these insurrectionary movements, he despatched Major-General Buchan with orders to collect a sufficient force from the garrisons at Carrickfergus, Lisburn, and Antrim, and reduce the people of Down to due subjection to his authority. Buchan accordingly placed himself at the head of three troops of horse, and on the 13th of April marched from Lisburn towards Killileagh. He was followed by the greater part of Tyrconnell's, Antrim's, and Cormack O'Neill's regiments of foot, under the command of Lieutenant-Colonel Mark Talbot, who overtook the general about five o'clock the same evening. Hunter, apprised of their approach, but not expecting an attack, had collected his followers to the number of two thousand, and had taken up a position between Comber and Killileagh. Buchan, however, lost no time. On the arrival of the infantry, he immediately attacked the Protestants, and speedily routed these undisciplined volunteers; three hundred were slain in this "Break of Killileagh," as it was called; Hunter himself was ridden down by the dragoons, but recovering his horse, and finding himself surrounded, he accepted quarter, and delivered up his arms. Being near a deer-park, however, he seized an opportunity to escape; and springing over the wall, fled to the castle of Killileagh, in which he had previously placed a garrison of fifty men. But finding that these had fled, he withdrew to the coast, and succeeded in reaching the Isle of Man in safety. General Buchan, with the horse, proceeded to Newtownards, Donaghadee, and Portaferry, driving before him the flying Protestants who had been in arms; and having left a strong force, under Brigadier-General Maxwell, to preserve tranquillity throughout that extensive district, he returned to Carrickfergus, and placed his troops in their former quarters.<sup>57</sup>

<sup>57</sup> "Case of Captain Henry Hunter," &c., ut supra. Leslie's "Answer to King," p. 155, et seq. Leslie relates these events with a strong bias against both Hunter and the Protestants. He represents Sir Robert Maxwell as sending one John Stuart, an apothecary in Downpatrick, to invite Captain Savage and his company to take up their

During these commotions, which extended over the entire province, public religious worship was almost wholly suspended. The Presbyterian ministers, being especially obnoxious to the Catholic authorities, were generally obliged, after the decisive victory at Dromore, to abandon their congregations and seek safety in flight; while the few who had ventured to remain were now, by the break of Killileagh, compelled to adopt a similar course. They mostly withdrew to Scotland, where they were hospitably entertained and recognised as ministers, and freely admitted into parochial charges, till they should be enabled to return to Ireland. Lest, however, in this influx of strange ministers, any unworthy or unauthorised persons should be unwarily received into the established Church, the General Assembly, at its first meeting, applied to those brethren from Ulster, who were then in Edinburgh, for an authenticated list of all the ministers and probationers belonging to the Presbyterian Church in Ireland, for the guidance of its subordinate courts in admitting ministers to vacant parishes. This list was accordingly compiled and presented to the Assembly on the 20th of May. It has been fortunately preserved,<sup>58</sup> and quarters in Killileagh's, to protect the town against Hunter and his rabble, as he calls the Protestants, and then as despatching one Gawn Irvine twice to Hunter, urging him to attack Savage, who was betrayed, as he alleges, by Sir Robert. He palliates the severities of the Romanists, and greatly underrates the losses of the Protestants; but, at the same time, he deems it of importance to inform us, "that part of Colonel Mark Talbot's wig was shot off his head by a bullet from the castle of Killileagh, while pursuing the enemy." The account given by Hunter in his "Case" is corroborated by the brief narrative of these proceedings which is given in the "True and Impartial Account," already quoted. The anonymous author of this important pamphlet adds, that, after the break of Killileagh, "Lord Duleek's horse chased the Protestants into the sea at Donaghadee; but one Captain Agnew, riding at anchor, took sixty-eight on board, and conveyed them gratis to Scotland." Owing to the embargo laid on all vessels both in Ireland and Scotland, the inhabitants of Ulster experienced great difficulty in obtaining passages across the channel. In the London Gazette, No. 2448, I find the following statement on this subject in a letter from Edinburgh, dated April 20:—"The [Scottish] estates, upon a petition presented to them on behalf of the Protestants of Ireland, have, notwithstanding their late order of embargo, allowed such ships as the petitioners could agree with, to sail thither, to transport such of the said Protestants as they could to this kingdom."

exhibits the surprising extension of the Church in Ulster, notwithstanding all the discouragements and persecutions which her ministers and people had endured during the previous thirty years. The number of congregations had increased to an hundred, three-fourths of which enjoyed settled pastors; there were eighty ministers under the care of five presbyteries, and eleven probationers ready to receive calls from the vacant congregations. The General Assembly cheerfully recognised all the ministers from Ireland, whose names were thus submitted to them, as "friends and brethren," equally entitled with their own ministers to be inducted into parishes, and become members of their ecclesiastical courts. Nearly fifty Irish ministers had taken refuge in Scotland and were settled in various parts of the kingdom, where they attentively observed the progress of events in their native country, and awaited with anxiety the issue of the momentous struggle around the walls of Derry.

Never before did such important results depend on the cap-

gations, and exhibits the state of the Presbyterian Church as it stood in March, 1689. Having never been printed, I have inserted a copy of it in the Appendix. The meeting to which it was presented was not legally a General Assembly, the parliament not having yet settled the ecclesiastical establishment. It was a general meeting of ministers and elders, deputed from as many presbyteries as could meet and send forward commissioners. The following extract from the minutes of the Presbytery of Irvine furnishes the instructions by which presbyteries were guided in choosing their commissioners, and evinces the happy cordiality and confidence which subsisted between the Scottish and Irish ministers, of which many similar proofs might be given:—"Irvine, April 30, 1689. Sederunt, Messrs. Patrick Walker, moderator, &c., also Messrs. Wm. [Neil?] Gray, John Campbell, Robert Young [Henry?], John Wilson, Robert Stirling, Wm. Legat, David Airth, James Scott, Ireland ministers. Mr. Meldrum reported he had a letter from Alex. Strang, clerk to the general meeting, which letter he exhibited, and it did bear that the ministers at Edinburgh and others did meet occasionally, and had seen it fit to call a general meeting to sit at Edinburgh, the 15th day of May next; and therefore desiring that commissioners may be sent from the Presbytery thereto with a ruling-elder; also that the ministers from Ireland settled in their bounds, may officiate and concur in the election; and those not employed be desired to come in to the general meeting. Therefore, Mr. Forbes, Mr. Warner, Mr. Cunningham, and the Laird of Fergushill were appointed to attend the general meeting the said day; and Mr. Legat and Mr. Gray to attend as Ireland ministers residing in their bounds and therein employed; and the rest of the Ireland brethren, not employed in their bounds, were desired also to attend."—Pres. ture of so small a city ; and seldom has so untenable and ill-supplied a place been defended with such obstinate valour. During the month of May, no event of importance occurred in the progress of the siege. On the 23rd of that month the governors wrote to Edinburgh and London, that the long promised supplies of ammunition and provisions might be speedily transmitted.<sup>59</sup> A few days afterwards, Major-General Kirk, with three regiments of foot and several ships of war, sailed from Liverpool ; it was the middle of June, however, before he reached Lough Foyle, and when he did arrive, he made no effort to afford relief. Had he promptly and resolutely proceeded up the river, there can be no doubt he would then have reached the city in safety. But he suffered himself to be deterred by exaggerated reports, not only of the strength of the enemy's works at Culmore and other parts of the river, but also of obstructions in the channel, caused by a boom thrown across, and by sunken boats laden with stones,<sup>60</sup> although the boom was not completed till some days after the arrival of the fleet, while the latter statement was wholly without foundation. The inactivity of Kirk, notwithstanding the signals of urgent distress repeatedly made by the garrison, was most discouraging. But the news of the violent proceedings of James and his parliament in Dublin—which had commenced its sittings on the 7th of May, and in a few weeks had attainted above two thousand Protestants, and restored to the Romanists all their forfeited estates, to the utter ruin of the Protestant possessors—confirmed the defenders of Derry in their resolution to maintain their city to the last extremity. James, sensible of the importance of speedily reducing it, despatched from Dublin Marshal De Rosen, at the head of a considerable reinforcement, with peremptory orders to push forward the operations against the city with the utmost vigour.

He reached the camp before Derry on the 18th of June, and from this period the siege was closely pressed, and the garrison, already beginning to suffer under scarcity of provisions, were harassed by frequent bombardments. De Rosen, habituated to the cruelties and oppressions of continental warfare, had recourse to an inhuman expedient to ensure, as he supposed, the immediate surrender of the city. He caused all the Protestants who could be collected within ten miles, not men merely, but helpless women and children, to be driven under the walls, and to be kept there without shelter, protection, or food, until the terms of capitulation which he had dictated should be accepted by the garrison. This unprecedented barbarity, however, was unavailing; the governor threatened to execute the Irish prisoners in the city, and erected a gallows on a conspicuous part of the wall; De Rosen relented; and on the 3rd of July, these wretched fugitives were permitted to return to their plundered homes.

In the meantime, Kirk still kept his squadron at anchor, without making the least attempt towards the relief of the besieged. He had indeed sent the Bonadventure frigate, under Captain Hobson, to Ballyshannon, to ascertain the condition of the garrison at Enniskillen, which still held out against the enemy;<sup>61</sup> and on the 7th of July, he despatched to Lough Swilly a part of his fleet, with six hundred men, under Lieutenant-Colonel William Stewart, to form an encampment on the island of Inch, with the view of affording protection to the Protestants of the surrounding districts of Donegal, and of keeping open his communication with Enniskillen. On the 10th, this detachment landed on Inch, and under the chief engineer, Captain Richards, some temporary works were thrown up on the strand, where, at low water, the island is accessible from the mainland. The enemy were on the alert, and stationed there three troops of horse, which frequently attempted to impede the progress of the works, but without success. Soon after his arrival, Colonel Stewart sent a small party, under Captain Robert Echlin, with Lieutenants Pigot and Hart, to disperse a body of the Irish collected at a "cow-camp" at Tully, about six miles distant; and a few days afterwards a boat was carried to Lough Fern, near the same place, to relieve a Mr. Cunningham and a body of forty Protestants, who had taken refuge in a small island in that secluded lake. Captain Echlin, having effected these objects, returned with his party in safety, and quartered his men in the town of Ramullan. Soon after, the colonel having received intelligence that the Duke of Berwick, with a considerable force, was on his way from Castlefinn towards Lough Swilly, sent orders to Echlin to remove his party into Inch; but before these orders could be complied with, the duke, at the head of fifteen hundred horse and foot, on the 18th of July, attacked Ramullan. The streets having been hastily barricaded, the horse were unable to penetrate into the town, and the men being judiciously posted, under Captain Henry Hunter, who after his escape from Down had joined the armament under Kirk,<sup>62</sup> the Irish forces were compelled to retire, with the loss of several officers and above two hundred men. At night, Echlin, who lost only a Lieutenant Cunningham, removed his men into the island, and abandoned Ramullan to the enemy; but the duke, disheartened by the warm reception he encountered, retreated to his quarters at Castlefinn, having committed many outrages on the Protestants of the intervening district.

The works on Inch were soon after completed. Sixteen pieces of cannon were planted on several batteries and redoubts, while two vessels, with five guns and a company of five-and-thirty men in each, lay constantly on the strand. The island thus fortified afforded a seasonable refuge to the

Protestants of the extensive and populous districts adjoining Lough Swilly, who fled thither to the number of twelve thousand. On the 20th of July, Kirk arrived at the island from Lough Foyle with the remainder of the fleet, and immediately despatched two vessels, with ten experienced officers and a supply of arms, for the garrison of Enniskillen, under the direction of two gentlemen from that town who had arrived in the Bonadventure on her return to the fleet a few days previously. Scarcely had he sent off this supply when he received intelligence by land from Derry which induced him to weigh again in the afternoon; and with the Swallow frigate, accompanied by three vessels laden with provisions, and armed with forty musketeers each, he returned to Lough Foyle.<sup>63</sup> At the mouth of the lough he fell in with the Portland frigate, commanded by Captain Lee, by whom he sent orders to Commodore Rooke, then cruising off Carrickfergus, to send him forth with the Dartmouth frigate, as probably being best adapted for the intended operations in the river. On the 22nd, the three victuallers anchored off Culmore, but beyond the range of the fort; these vessels were the Mountjoy of Derry, Captain Micaiah Browning; the Phoenix of Coleraine, Captain Andrew Douglass; and the Jerusalem, Captain Reynell. Three days afterwards they were joined by the Dartmouth frigate, commanded by Captain Leake, and immediately after her arrival, Kirk, from on board the Swallow, at length issued his orders to them to attempt the passage of the river the moment that the wind should prove favourable. He directed the Dartmouth to engage the fort, that under the cover of her guns the Mountjoy might effect a passage; the Phoenix was then to follow, and the Jerusalem to weigh, so soon as a signal should be made that one or other of her consorts had passed the boom.

For several days the wind continued adverse. The garrison were reduced to the last extremity. Nearly all their resources of food, including some of the most nauseous and disgusting substances, had failed; their number was fearfully reduced, and above one-fourth were rendered unserviceable by the conjoined effects of famine and fatigue. Their hearts were sickened with the oft-deferred hope of relief. The fleet, from which they expected so much, had indeed again appeared; but they lay inactive, tantalising them with the near approach of ample supplies still unaccountably withheld. At length, about six o'clock in the afternoon of Sunday, the 28th of July, a moderate gale springing up from the north-west, the Dartmouth weighed and stood towards Culmore. The fort immediately opened a brisk cannonade; "Captain Leake behaved himself very bravely and prudently in this action, neither firing great or small shot (though he was plied very hard with both) till he came on the wind of the castle, and there beginning to batter, that the victuallers might pass under shelter of his guns, he lay between the castle and them within musket shot, and came to an anchor."<sup>64</sup> At this critical moment the wind calmed a little and became less favourable, but the Mountjoy succeeded in passing the fort, and accompanied by the long-boat of the Swallow, "well barricadoed and armed with seamen to cut the boome," she sailed onwards in the midst of a sharp and well-directed fire from both sides of the river, till repelled by her first shock against the boom, she ran aground, and her gallant commander was, at the same moment, killed by a musket-ball. Favoured, however, by the rising tide, and rebounding from a broadside which she discharged for the purpose, she soon floated again; and the boatswain's mate of the Swallow, who had the command of the long-boat, having cut the boom,<sup>65</sup> the vessel by her weight,

<sup>65</sup> Ibid, No. 2478. The unaccountable inactivity of Kirk, who had the command of the squadron in Lough Foyle, specially despatched from England for the relief of Derry, is well known, and has been ascribed to various motives—sometimes to treachery, and at other times to cowardice. What ultimately induced him to determine to move his ships towards the city has never been stated or even conjectured; but the true cause is now at length ascertained. It was owing to the local knowledge and the warm remonstrances of an Irish Presbyterian minister, who, at the hazard of his life, had sailed from Greenock, where he had taken temporary refuge, to Lough Foyle, and who urged the general to make the attempt which proved so successful, and which, had it been delayed for even a few days longer, would have been too late! This interesting fact has been preserved by the truly indefatigable Wodrow, in the collection of miscellaneous historical materials which he entitled "Analecta." The minister referred to was the Rev. James Gordon, who was minister of the Presbyterian Church at Glendermot, nigh Derry, from about the year 1680. At the first appearance of danger from the popish faction, he took an active part against their machinations; and he it was, according to Mackenzie's "Narrative" (pp. 3, 4), who first ventured to propose the bold measure of shutting the gates against the Irish regiment sent by the Lord Lieutenant to garrison Derry; and, in opposition to the strenuous advice of the bishop of Derry, he succeeded in effecting this object, on which so much ultimately depended. He was afterwards obliged to leave the country, and sojourned for a time at Greenock. After the deliverance of the city, to which he had contributed so materially, he returned to Scotland, and became minister of the parish of Cardross, on the Clyde, near Dumbarton, whence, by letter to the Presbytery of Lagan, in January, 1692, he demitted the charge of the congregation of Glendermot. He died at Cardross not long after. The following is the account preserved by Wodrow:—

"Mr. John Smith gives me this further account of Mr. James Gordon, which he had from his successor, Mr. A. Wallace. That Mr. Gordon, in the time of the siege of Derry, was at Greenock, and fell under great impressions of the hazard and danger they were in, and resolves to go and see; he gets a boat and goes to Derry Lough, where Major Kirk was lying with provisions, but either would not (as many say) or could not get up for the cross-boom or chain the besiegers had fixed. He goes aboard one of the English ships, Captain Brouey—(this was the Mountjoy, Captain Browning)—whether he was acquainted with him or not the relator knew not, and abused him for not venturing up the lough when the city was so much in strait. The captain laid the fault on Kirk, and desired Mr. Gordon to be silent, for Kirk stormed extraordinarily, and said he would hang Mr. Gordon. He went straight to him, and Kirk made him very welcome, and asked how he was. Mr. Gordon told him he heard he said he would hang him! Kirk took him to the cabin, and challenged him for his opprobrious language, and for his calling them cowards. Mr. Gordon told him he had said so, for the design (or plan for relieving the city) was easy. Kirk said it was impossible! Mr. Gordon called for paper and said he would draught it for him (which he was able to do from having been, as minister of Glendermot, personally acquainted with the locality). When Kirk saw Mr. Gordon's skill, he said —'Aye, but who will venture?' 'I will venture for one,' says Mr. Gordon, 'and Captain Brouey said he would venture, and another.' And so Kirk yielded and commissioned them. The captain's ship went up first and broke the boom in the lough, and the captain was killed; yet the ship got through and came up to the town, and was the means of relief to it. This account Mr. Gordon gave to several of the elders of Cardross, from whom Mr. Wallace had it."

evening, to the inexpressible joy of the famishing garrison, who had observed with intense anxiety every turn in their progress up the river. The two victuallers lost only five or six men, with Lieutenant Seys, of Sir John Hanmer's regiment, wounded, and the boatswain's mate injured by a splinter. The Dartmouth, having grounded off Culmore at low water, lay exposed to the enemy's fire till the morning tide, when she repassed the fort into Lough Foyle, having had only one soldier killed and another wounded, and the purser, Mr. Lee,

A few years after Wodrow had received this account, he heard the same incident related by another person, and he also inserts it among his collections. As it varies in some particulars from the preceding statement, it is here subjoined :—

"Mr. John Richy confirms to me all the accounts before set down anent Mr. James Gordon. He came to Mr. A. Gordon, and told him he behoved to go to Derry, and would not be put off; that the commander of the ship to which he went was one Brown, who entertained him as a ~~chaplain~~ under the notice of a Protestant minister; that he allowed him to pray and exhort Scripture some days in his ship; that in his doctrine he reproved them for lying idle and feasting, while their brethren were perishing; that Kirk had hanged some for making a mutiny some days before; that he came aboard Brown's ship, and called for that schoolmaster he heard was reflecting on his management; that Mr. Gordon briskly told him he was a minister and knew the country, laid down the scheme directed a fort to be kept in play with one ship till another broke the boom, and Brown was shot just as the boom was broke; however the ship got through, and came up to Derry; that Mr. Gordon stayed with Kirk in his ship, as a hostage till the experiment was tried, and was willing to undergo any punishment he pleased, if it did not succeed."

There can be no hesitation in receiving this account as substantially correct and perfectly authentic. Mackenzie's "Narrative" evinces the deep interest which the minister of Glendernot took in the early defence of the city; and, from the other anecdotes of him recorded by Wodrow, he was obviously of that ardent and zealous temperament which would lead him to return to Lough Foyle, in hopes of benefitting his besieged brethren. The collateral facts contained in this statement are all correctly given; and the death of Captain Browning, who alone knew of Mr. Gordon's interference (with the exception of Kirk, who was not likely to divulge it), may account for this anecdote not having found its way into any of the contemporary narratives of the siege of Derry. It has now been disinterred from the oblivion in which it was so long shrouded. Let it never be forgotten, then, that while the maiden city was heroically defended from within by a garrison, of which above nine-tenths were Presbyterians, its relief from without, at that most critical moment, when its gallant defenders were reduced to the last extremity, and when, to all human appearance, the pressure of the famine must have forced them to a speedy surrender, was owing to the intrepidity, the local knowledge, and the courageous interference of a Presbyterian minister!

[This note, which is not to be found in the first edition of this work, originally appeared in McConnell's Presbyterian Almanac for 1844. It was furnished by the author to the editor of that publication, and is now transferred to its appropriate place in this history.]

having received a slight contusion.<sup>66</sup> Two days afterwards, the Irish army abandoned their trenches, having lost an hundred officers, and between eight and nine thousand men; and on the last day of July, this memorable siege terminated, having continued during the long period of an hundred and five days. "And thus," writes a Presbyterian minister who was in the city during the entire blockade, "was the siege of Derry raised, to the admiration of our friends who had given us over for lost, and to the disappointment of our enemies who were no less confident they should soon make themselves masters of so weak and indefensible a place. The glory of it being entirely due to the Almighty, who inspired a garrison, for the most part made up of a few raw and untrained men, and those labouring under all possible discouragements, with that resolution that enabled them to defeat all the attempts of a numerous army to reduce them: their zeal and affection for the just cause they had undertaken supplying all the defects of military discipline."<sup>67</sup>

<sup>66</sup> The statements in the text, relative to the proceedings at Inch, and the nautical movements connected with the relief of the city, are taken from the authentic despatches of Kirk, written at the time, and published in the gazettes already quoted. Many of these minute particulars having escaped the notice of previous historians of the siege of Derry, not excepting even Walker and Mackenzie, I have given them more in detail than I would otherwise have done. It is exceedingly interesting to turn over the gazettes of this year, and observe the extreme avidity with which the court and the people of London received the most trivial and often croneous intelligence respecting the progress of the siege, and the state of affairs in Ulster at this critical conjuncture. The joyful news of the relief of Derry reached the King, at Hampton Court, on the 4th of August, by an express with letters from Kirk, written on board the Swallow, on the morning after the victuallers had reached the quay.

<sup>67</sup> Mackenzie, p. 46. The first account of the siege which appeared was published by Walker, in London, so early as the month of September. In it he claimed the merit of the defence of Derry for the members of his own communion, while the only commendation he bestowed on the Nonconformist ministers in the city, whose names he carefully suppressed, was that "they kept their people very obedient and quiet," as if the Presbyterians had been a disaffected and turbulent minority. This disingenuous and bigoted partiality, which is evinced in other misstatements referred to in preceding notes (16 and 33), gave rise to a very warm controversy. First appeared Boyse's "Vindication of Mr. Osborne," already mentioned, to which Walker attempted a reply, entitled, "A Vindication of the True Account of the Siege of Derry in Ireland, by Mr. George Walker." London, 1689, 4to, pp. 33. Next came forth an ironical brochure against Walker, with this title, "An Apology for the failures charged on the Reverend Mr. George Walker's

Enniskillen was maintained with similar gallantry and success. Its defence contributed materially to the safety and preservation of Derry, by dividing the forces of James, and compelling him to quarter large detachments at Omagh, Derg, Castlefinn, and Strabane, for the purpose of cutting off the communication between these two resolute opponents of his arbitrary power. The garrison at Enniskillen were engaged in many severe skirmishes with the enemy. On the last day of July, at Newtownbutler, they gained the most decisive victory over the Irish that had occurred since the commencement of the war; routing an army of six thousand with a force amounting to not more than a third of that number, killing nearly two thousand on the field or in the pursuit, and taking prisoners the general, with numerous officers and four hundred men. A few days afterwards, they received the encouraging intelligence of the relief of Derry and the retreat of the besieging army; and being thus on every side freed from apprehension, the reverend historian of their actions adds, "we kept the 7th of August as a day of thanksgiving for the great victory God gave us over our enemies, and the peace which we then enjoyed from them on all hands."<sup>68</sup> printed Account of the late Siege of Derry," &c. London, 1689, 4to, pp. 27, which produced a reply, entitled, "Reflections on a Paper pretending to be an Apology for the failures charged on Mr Walker's Account of the Siege of Londonderry." London, 1689, 4to, pp. 29. Soon after was published Mackenzie's "Narrative of the Siege of Londonderry, or the late memorable transactions of that city faithfully represented, to rectify the mistakes and supply the omissions of Mr. Walker's account. By John Mackenzie, chaplain to a regiment there during the siege." London, 1690, 4to, pp. 64. This was fiercely assailed in a tract, entitled, "Mr. John Mackenzie's Narrative of the Siege of Londonderry a false libel, in defence of Dr. George Walker. Written by his friend in his absence." London, 1690, 4to, pp. 18. To this anonymous attack Mackenzie immediately published a rejoinder, which he entitled, "Dr. Walker's invisible champion foiled; or, an Appendix to the late Narrative of the Siege of Londonderry; wherein all the arguments offered in a late pamphlet to prove it a false libel are examined and refuted. By John Mackenzie, publisher of the said Narrative." London, 1690, 4to, pp. 13. With this publication the controversy closed. [A new edition of Mackenzie's "Memorials of the Siege of Derry," including his Narrative and its Vindication—has been recently published (Belfast, 1861) with an introduction and notes by the continuator of this history.]

The several sections of the Irish army that had been engaged before Derry and Enniskillen retreated contemporaneously, plundering and destroying every thing in their route. Major-General Buchan, with a regiment of foot and some dragoons, proceeded to Charlemont, and the Duke of Berwick took up a position at Newry. Colonel Charles Macarty Moore was appointed governor of Carrickfergus, and the garrison was strengthened by the addition of several detachments from the retreating army. Major-General Maxwell was stationed in command of Belfast and Lisburn; and Sir Charles Carney, having burned Newtownlimavady, occupied Coleraine, and put the town into a posture of defence.

Scarcely had these military arrangements been completed when a formidable armament from England, which had been long expected, made its appearance off the coast of Down. About four o'clock in the afternoon of Tuesday, the 13th of August, a fleet of nearly one hundred sail, having on board to add, that the gallant defenders of Derry and Enniskillen were treated very ungratefully by the State. Instead of being in any wise rewarded, they did not even receive the amount of pay which was acknowledged by parliament to be justly due to them. In 1691, the officers and men of both garrisons constituted Colonel Hugh Hamill, of Lisford, their agent and trustee, and authorised him to make the necessary applications to the crown and to parliament for their arrears. Seven years afterwards he resigned this office, and his brother, William Hamill, who resided principally in England, was appointed in his room. He used every effort in his power on behalf of his employers, but without success; and, in 1714, he published a statement of his proceedings, and a strong appeal to the public, entitled, "A Memorial by William Hamill, Gent., agent and trustee for the officers and soldiers of the two late garrisons of Londonderry and Inniskilling, in Ireland, their reliefs and representatives. Dedicated to his principals." London, 1714, 8vo, pp. 40. This effort in their favour met with no better success, and he was again compelled to lay their hard case before the nation in a second publication, with this sarcastic and significant title, "A view of the danger and folly of being public-spirited and sincerely loving one's country, in the deplorable case of the Londonderry and Inniskilling regiments; being a true and faithful account of their unparalleled services and sufferings at and since the Revolution. To which is added the particular case of William Hamill, Gent., their agent." London, 1721, 4to, pp. 74. From this work it appears that, after two-and-thirty years' tedious and fruitless negotiations, the following arrears were still due to the eight regiments that formed the garrison of Derry during the siege:—Baker's regiment, £16,274 9s. 8d.; Mitchellburn's £9,541 16s.; Walker's, £10,188 13s. 6d.; Munroe's £8,360 2s.; Crofton's £7,750 11s. 6d.; Hamill's £8,969 13s. 6d.; Lane's £8,360 2s.; Murray's £5,312 9s. 6d.; making a total of £74,757 17s. 8d., not a farthing of which appears to have been ever paid!

ten thousand horse and foot, under the command of the celebrated Duke of Schomberg, anchored in Bangor Bay. The same evening the troops landed at Groomsport, and encamped in the open fields. On the following day a reconnoitering party, under Sir Charles Fielding, was sent to Belfast to ascertain the position of the enemy; but finding they had retired towards Lisburn, Colonel Wharton's regiment took possession of the town, and two days afterwards Lieutenant-Colonel Caulfield was despatched to occupy Antrim, and found it also deserted. On Saturday the duke removed his head-quarters to Belfast, and on the Tuesday following sent a strong body of horse and foot to blockade Carrickfergus, the suburbs of which had been burned a few days previously by the governor in the expectation of a siege. After a fruitless parley, trenches were opened before the town, and a few guns planted, the fire of which was principally directed against Joymount Palace, a house belonging to the Earl of Donegall, whereon the garrison had mounted a couple of guns. On Friday, the 23rd, a second parley was held, and another attempt made towards a capitulation; but the duke rejected the terms, and ordered new works to be erected, and the approaches to be pushed forward with greater vigour. The town was now regularly invested. Three batteries were in full operation; one towards the west, on the Windmill-hill, a second opposite to the north-gate, and a third to the east within range of Lord Donegall's house; on these were placed several mortars, which bombarded the town and destroyed many buildings. The Sabbath caused no intermission in the firing, and on that day a considerable breach was effected in the wall near the north-gate, but during the night it was successfully repaired by the garrison. On the following day, however, notwithstanding all their efforts, the breach was renewed and widened, the artillery played incessantly on the town, and several of the ships of war brought their guns to bear upon the castle, so that early in the morning of Tuesday, the 27th of August, the flag of truce was once more hoisted on the castle for another parley, articles of capitulation were agreed upon, and on the next day the garrison, consisting of two regiments of foot, marched out, and were conducted to Newry, the nearest quarters occupied by their army. Sir Henry Inglesby's regiment took possession of the town and castle; and soon after, the whole of the forces under Schomberg encamped about a mile beyond Belfast, where they lay for several days.

The duke did not remain here long. The train of artillery being sent off by sea to Carlingford, the army commenced its march on Monday, the 2nd of September; and, proceeding by Hillsborough, Dromore, and Loughbrickland, on Thursday reached Newry, which was found in flames, and just abandoned by the enemy.<sup>69</sup> On Saturday the troops advanced to Dundalk, and encamped about a mile on the north side of the town. Here they were joined by three regiments from Derry,

<sup>69</sup> The account given in the text of Schomberg's movements is taken from an eye-witness, the Rev. George Story, who narrates them with great minuteness and fidelity in his "Impartial History of the Wars of Ireland." London, 4to, 1691 and 1693. I subjoin the following extracts illustrative of the state of the country at the time of the march of the army from Belfast to Newry:—"LISBURN is one of the prettiest inland towns in the north of Ireland, and one of the most English-like places in the kingdom." (Page 11.) "At DROMORE, the inhabitants had all or most of them left the town, and there was not so much as a sheep or a cow to be seen. (Page 12.) "At LOUGHBRICKLAND, the inhabitants had deserted this place also, and what little corn there was, some lay reapt and not bound up, and the rest was spoiled for want of management." (Ibid.) "In NEWRY, an old square tower which they call the castle, was left standing, and not above five or six houses more; the town itself had been a pretty place and well built, standing upon an advantageous pass. I went abroad into the country, where I found all the houses deserted for several miles; most of them that I observed had crosses upon the inside above the doors upon the thatch, some made of wood, and others of straw or rushes finely wrought, some houses had more and some less. I understood afterwards that it was the custom of the native Irish to set up a new cross every Corpus Christi day; and so many years as they have lived in such a house, as many crosses you may find. I asked a reason for it, but the custom was all they pretended to. Here the corn also was either lying and rotting on the ground, or else was shaken by the violent winds, for the people were all gone, the Protestants the March before, and the Irish now at the retreating of their army." (Pages 13, 14.) "BELFAST is a very large town, and the greatest for trade in the north of Ireland; it stands at the head of the bay of Carrickfergus, and the inhabitants have lately built a very famous stone bridge, but the wars coming on, it is not as yet quite finished." (Page 38.)

under the command of Major-General Kirk, who had previously taken Coleraine, from which the garrison, under Carney, had fled in such confusion, that, "they had tarred the bridge and laid combustible stuff in order to burn it, but their fear was such that none of them would stay to set fire to it."<sup>70</sup> Schomberg, unable to advance farther for want of supplies, and unwilling to move far from his fleet, resolved to await the further movements of the Irish army, and accordingly formed an entrenched camp at Dundalk. Meanwhile, James collected his troops, and on the 14th of September, marched towards Ardee, where he was joined by Tyrconnel. A few days afterwards he approached within sight of the English camp, and offered battle; but Schomberg declined to hazard an engagement, under the unfavourable circumstances in which his army was placed, the Irish forces returned to Ardee, which they fortified, and where they lay during several weeks. But forage growing scarce, and the weather becoming unusually inclement, James broke up his quarters on the 3rd of November, and withdrew to Drogheda, and thence to Dublin. His example was the more readily followed by Schomberg, in consequence of the great sickness and mortality which had for some time prevailed in his camp, and which had carried off or disabled nearly the one-half of his officers and men. The sick were sent by sea to Belfast, and on the 7th of November the army left Dundalk, and were distributed in winter quarters throughout the north-eastern part of the province. The duke fixed his head-quarters at Lisburn, and selected Belfast for the hospitals. His frontier garrisons were at Newry, Rostrevor, and Greencastle; he placed strong detachments at Tandragee, Richhill, and Armagh; and pushed his quarters westward even so far as Monaghan and Clones, whence communication was maintained with Enniskillen and Derry. The only place in the north that continued in possession of the Romanist forces was Charlemont, which being well fortified, and the garrison under Teague O'Regan amply supplied with provisions, held out until the commencement of the next campaign.

With the exception of a few skirmishes along the frontiers of the province, Ulster now enjoyed comparative tranquillity. Since the arrival of Schomberg, the inhabitants had begun to return to their homes, security and good order were generally restored, and the usual occupations were resumed in the towns and throughout the country. Scarcely a spot, however, in the province had escaped the desolating effects of civil war. Houses had been everywhere plundered or burned; horses, cattle, and stock of every kind had been carried away or destroyed. The labours of the field had been suddenly interrupted in the spring; they were very tardily prosecuted amid the alarms and discouragements of a campaign, and the scanty harvest had been only partially reaped, through the want of labourers. The ministers, nevertheless, gradually returned to their charges, and resumed their pastoral duties. In Down and Antrim no meetings of the Presbytery had been held from the month of March until the beginning of September. At the first meeting which they held after this interruption, they appointed a solemn day of thanksgiving "for the great mercy of a begun relief from bondage; and withal," they add, "considering the great danger we are yet in, and that by reason of the abounding provocations that are among us, we judge it convenient to join humiliation with it."<sup>71</sup> At the same time they drew up an address to the Duke of Schomberg, which was presented to him before he left Belfast. Soon after, the deputation that had been sent into England in the beginning of the year returned home, and gave a satisfactory account of their negotiations.

The brethren appointed to this mission were the Rev. Patrick Adair and the Rev. John Abernethy, and to these was subsequently added Colonel Arthur Upton, of Templepatrick, the tried friend of the Presbyterian Church. Immediately on their arrival in London they presented a congratulatory address to King William, conveying "the loyal and dutiful expression of their zeal for the late happy revolution, for which they adored the infinite goodness of Almighty God ; and with all possible joy embraced their great deliver and congratulated his happy accession to the crown, with assurances of their steady and inviolable respect to his person and government."<sup>72</sup> Having received further instructions from the ministers who had fled to Scotland, and who wrote to them from Glasgow in June, they drew up the following petition, and presented it to the King in the end of August:—

"Whereas your petitioners did present an humble address to your majesty from the Presbyterian ministers and others of that persuasion in the north of Ireland, which your majesty was graciously pleased to accept ; and they being instructed humbly to request your majesty's protection and favour in some particulars not yet offered to your majesty's consideration, do most humbly pray—That their former and present sufferings, well known to those who live amongst them, as well as their continued loyalty and early appearing for your majesty may be favourably considered ;—That all sufferings for nonconformity may be for the future prevented ;—That as by your princely care relief is sent to that languishing poor country which by the blessing of God hath already and will further produce happy effects, so your majesty will appear as a nursing-father for encouraging the purity of the Gospel in worship and discipline, till there be a legal establishment of both ;—That those ministers and their families, some of them having been in Londonderry during the late siege, others yet remaining in their places in Ulster, and the rest forced to fly to Scotland, being reduced to insupportable straits, may, for their present necessary support, have a proportionable share of the public charitable collections; and may be forthwith encouraged to return to their respective places by your majesty's allowing them a future competent support, until the peace and quiet of these parts of that despoiled and impoverished nation enable the inhabitants to maintain the said ministers in such a way as your majesty in your great wisdom shall find just. Which will greatly conduce to the replanting those parts of that kingdom, augment your revenue there, increase prayers for your majesty's success, endear the affections of your loyal subjects, and strengthen your hands against your rebellious enemies."<sup>73</sup>

To this petition they received a favourable answer in September, through the medium of the Duke of Shrewsbury, one of the principal secretaries of state, containing a promise that an annual pension of eight hundred pounds should be conferred on the ministers; and, on leaving London, they received from the King a recommendatory letter to the Duke of Schomberg, which records, in the following complimentary terms, his majesty's sense of their distinguished services in his behalf:—"Whereas some ministers of the Presbyterian persuasion have humbly besought us in behalf of themselves, their brethren, and their congregations in the province of Ulster in our kingdom of Ireland, that we would take them under our gracious protection, and, as an assurance thereof, that we would please to recommend them to you, or other our chief governor or governors of the said kingdom: And we being entirely satisfied of the loyalty and fidelity of our said subjects and commiserating the sufferings and calamities they have of late lain under, which we are desirous to put an end to, as far as we can contribute towards it, we have thought fit to grant their request; and, accordingly, we do hereby recommend to you in a particular manner the said ministers and their congregations, requiring you to give them that protection and support that their affection to our service does deserve, and to show them all fitting countenance, that they may live in tranquillity and unmolested under our government.”<sup>74</sup>

So soon as Mr. Adair returned to Belfast, this important letter was presented to Schomberg. Under his fostering influence, the Presbyterians enjoyed ample protection and toleration; so that when King William arrived in Ulster, a few months afterwards, he found them, as a body, more numerous and influential than he had anticipated, and not unworthy of peculiar favour. With alacrity, therefore, he redressed their grievances and vindicated their rights; and to this renowned sovereign—truly of GLORIOUS MEMORY, not as the founder of a party, but as the intrepid assertor of civil and religious freedom—may, in a great measure, be ascribed the subsequent prosperity of the PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH IN IRELAND.

THE province of Ulster enjoyed comparative tranquillity during the winter which followed the relief of Derry and the arrival of Schomberg’s army. King James’s troops were indeed in possession of the fort of Charlemont,<sup>1</sup> and several skirmishes occurred between the hostile parties on the southern and western frontiers of the province, but the general security was undisturbed. Still, it was a most anxious winter to the Protestant residents. All felt that their condition was exceedingly critical, and their security very precarious. King James was in Dublin, busily engaged in preparing for the campaign of the approaching summer, on the success of which all his hopes were placed; and France had promised a large reinforcement of her veteran soldiery to assist him in subduing his rebellious subjects in Ireland. Many of King William's warmest supporters, in Ulster and elsewhere, had been disappointed at the inadequate results of Schomberg's campaign in the previous autumn, while exaggerated reports of the number and strength of James's secret adherents in both the sister kingdoms increased their alarm. Their chief dependence was in William himself, and all, therefore, felt the greatest relief when it became known that his majesty had resolved to place himself at the head of his army in Ireland, and conduct the war in person.

Various considerations had induced him to adopt this resolution. The disappointment felt at the alleged inactivity of Schomberg, the complaints of the convention-parliament against the management of Irish affairs, and the stability which the new government had already attained in England and Scotland, urged and enabled him to conduct this important campaign in person. In the meantime, the greatest efforts were made by Schomberg, during the spring of 1690, to augment the army, improve its discipline, and provide adequate stores of provisions and arms. It is exceedingly painful to see, in the letters of this able general to the King, the many difficulties he had to contend with at this critical period in obtaining even the most necessary supplies. These difficulties were caused by the carelessness and dishonesty of the agents of government, and the lukewarmness and incapacity of some of the principal officers of the army, and they prevented the general from resuming operations so early as he had intended.*

* Dalrymple's "Memoirs of Great Britain and Ireland," vol. ii., App part ii., pp.

In the middle of March, however, active measures were taken to reduce Charlemont, "where," as Schomberg wrote to the King, "we cannot leave the enemy behind when your majesty advances with your army, without being put to much inconvenience."<sup>3</sup> His movements were quickened by the intelligence that the expected reinforcements from France had landed at Kinsale, to the number of five thousand fighting men. Both parties now hastened to complete their preparations for an early appeal to arms.

On the 12th of May, the fort of Charlemont at length surrendered. So soon as intelligence of this success reached London, the King hurried forward the bills then pending in parliament, and, on the 21st of that month, he closed the session, and immediately prepared for his journey to Ireland. In the first week of June he left Kensington, and eight days afterwards he sailed from High Lake, near Liverpool, under the convoy of six men-of-war, commanded by Sir Cloudesly Shovel, his majesty being on board of the Mary yacht, and the noblemen and gentlemen composing his suite in the other vessels. "They did not reach the north end of the Isle of Man," says an eye-witness, "till ten o'clock on Friday night, the 13th of June. On Saturday, the 14th, the wind blew pretty fresh, and by half-an-hour after one on the same day, they arrived in the lough of Carrickfergus," where the stone is still pointed out on which this great deliverer first

I discover that in the artillery there has been a great deal of roguery; the bombs ill-charged, the canons ill-cast, the arms ill-made." (P. 31.) "There are many officers I could wish in England. I never saw more wicked or more interested. All the care of the colonels is to live by their regiments, without applying to any other thing." (P. 53.) "I never was in any army where there are so many new and lazy officers." (P. 70.) "The people who are in the tower understand these things very little, even the examination of the muskets, which the workmen deliver them every day; which are ill-made, ill-mounted, and have bad locks." (P. 75.) "I have found by experience since I left London that there is no counting with certainty upon the officers employed, either in the troops, the provisions, or the artillery."

set foot in Ireland. "On his landing the King immediately mounted and rode on horseback through the main street of the town, which was lined on both sides with innumerable crowds of people, who bid his majesty welcome with continual shouts and acclamations."<sup>4</sup> Duke Schomberg had prepared Sir William Franklin's house, at Belfast, for his majesty's reception; and on hearing of his arrival, he proceeded in his coach to wait upon him with all speed. The Prince of Wurtemberg, Major-General Kirk, and several other general officers, who had assembled at Belfast for that purpose, attended the duke. They met his majesty at the Whitehouse, who entered the duke's carriage, and drove along the strand into Belfast.<sup>5</sup> Here, as the records of the town relate, the King "was received at the entrance of the town<sup>6</sup> by the sovereign, [or chief magistrate, Captain Robert Leather,] burgesses, and inhabitants of the corporation, and that part of the army there, in their best formalities, with acclamations, great joy, and rejoicings; and was conducted to the castle, where he graciously received the sovereign and burgesses; where the sovereign, upon his knee, humbly presented the rod of authority, which his majesty received, bidding him rise, and gave it back again; and the sovereign again kneeling, presented an address from the sovereign, burgesses, and commonalty, which was read before his majesty, and afterwards the King received it, and put it in his pocket;<sup>7</sup> and then the sovereign and burgesses had the honour of kissing his majesty's hand."<sup>8</sup>

In the evening, the King was joined by his suite, consisting of his brother-in-law, George, Prince of Denmark, the Duke of Ormond, the Earls of Oxford, Portland, Scarborough, and Manchester, Lords Overkirk and Sydney, the Honourable Mr. Boyle, and many other distinguished individuals. He occupied the castle, the residence of Sir William Franklin, who had married the widow of the late Earl of Donegall, and who had taken a leading part among the gentry of Ulster in opposing the arbitrary measures of Tyrconnel. On the following day, which was the Sabbath, the King attended divine service in the parish church, where his chaplain, Dr. George Boyse, preached from the appropriate text, Heb. xi. 33, "Who through faith subdued kingdoms,"<sup>9</sup> and afterwards his majesty held a levee, which was attended by the noblemen and gentlemen then in town, and by many of the gentry from the vicinity. On Monday, the Rev. Dr. Walker, the celebrated governor of Derry during its siege, accompanied by a number of Episcopalian ministers, presented him with a dutiful address from "the clergy of the Church of Ireland now in Ulster."<sup>10</sup> The ministers of the Presbyterian Church were equally forward to testify their loyalty to their sovereign, and their consistent and unalterable attachment to his cause. Immediately after the Episcopalian clergy, a deputation, consisting of the Rev. Patrick Adair, minister of Belfast, the Rev. Archibald Hamilton, of Armagh, the Rev. Wm. Adair, of Ballycaston,* in the county of Antrim, with several other brethren, presented an address from "the Presbyterian ministers, and those of their persuasion in the north of Ireland," which his majesty received very graciously.<sup>11</sup> At the same time addresses were also presented from "the sheriffs, justices of peace, and gentlemen of the counties of Down and Antrim," and from "the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of Londonderry, for themselves and all the citizens thereof."<sup>12</sup>

The King set out from Belfast on Thursday, the 19th of June, having on that day issued a proclamation, "From his court at Belfast," exhorting all people to continue peaceably in their dwellings, and promising them protection. He dined with Duke Schomberg at Lisburn, which was still the headquarters of the army,<sup>13</sup> and that night he slept at Hillsborough. It was from this he issued that well-known order, addressed to Christopher Carleton, the collector of the customs at Belfast, authorising the payment of twelve hundred pounds yearly to the Presbyterian clergy of Ulster, in which originated the grant called the Regium Donum, or Royal Bounty, still enjoyed by their successors. This royal order contains so striking a testimony to the seasonable and hearty support which the Presbyterians gave to King William in effecting the deliverance of the empire from arbitrary power and the ascendancy of Romanism, as to entitle it to a place in these pages. His majesty says—"Whereas, upon our arrival in this kingdom at Belfast, we received a loyal and dutiful address from our trusty and well-beloved subjects, Patrick Adair, &c., in the name of themselves and the rest of the Presbyterian ministers of their persuasion in these northern parts of our kingdom: And

<sup>13</sup> Lisburn was also the place where the general post-office was kept. The post for England left every Monday and Thursday, by way of Portpatrick; and on every Thursday it left for Antrim, Coleraine, Londonderry, Lurgan, Armagh, Belturbet, Enniskillen, Loughbrickland, Newry, and Carrickfergus, and it arrived from these places every Wednesday.—MSS. calling to mind how early they also were in their address unto us upon our arrival in England, and the promises we then made them of a pension of eight hundred pounds per annum for their subsistence, which, by reason of several impediments, hath not as yet been made effectual unto them: And being assured of the peaceable and dutiful temper of our said subjects, and sensible of the losses they have sustained, and their constant labour to unite the hearts of others in zeal and loyalty towards us: We do hereby, out of our Royal Bounty, give and grant unto them the sum of twelve hundred pounds per annum, to be paid by quarterly payments, the first payment of three hundred pounds sterling to begin upon the 24th day of this instant June, and so forward: And our will and pleasure is, that you, or the collector of our customs at Belfast for the time being, do make due payments of the said pension into the hands of Mr. Patrick Adair, Alexander Hutcheson, Archibald Hamilton, Robert Craghead, Hugh Wilson, Robert Henry,* and William Adair,<sup>14</sup> or to the person which they or any five of them shall appoint, to be by them distributed among the rest. And for so doing this shall be your warrant. Given at our court at Hillsborough, the 19th day of June, 1690, in the second year of our reign."<sup>15</sup> This letter, however, was in force for only a brief period. So soon as the government of the kingdom was re-established, and its fiscal affairs reduced to order, it was found that the collector at Belfast would not be justified in paying away any portion of the money received by him, unless

[* Mr. Henry was ordained to the pastoral charge of Carrickfergus in 1674. In 1692, he was removed to Capel-street congregation, Dublin, where he died in 1699. His eldest son became a banker in Dublin, and, in 1715, was M.P. for the borough of Antrim. His son Joseph, of Straffan, county Kildare, married the eldest daughter of the Earl of Moira. upon a regular warrant from the crown, placing this pension on the civil-list for Ireland. Accordingly, in September the following year, letters patent, in the names of William and Mary, passed the privy seal, addressed to the lords-justices of Ireland, which placed this Royal Bounty on the Irish establishment, and made it payable out of the exchequer.<sup>16</sup>

It would be foreign to the object of this narrative to trace the military operations which William now conducted with his characteristic vigour, in conformity with his well-known declaration to some of his dilatory officers at Hillsborough, "that he was not come to Ireland to let the grass grow under his feet."<sup>17</sup> On Saturday, the 21st June, just a week after his arrival, he took the field; and, at the head of all his forces, marched from Newry towards the enemy, whose advanced posts were only a few miles from that town. On that day week, the whole army, composed of Danes, Germans, French, Dutch, Irish, and English, and amounting to 36,000 men, encamped about a mile south of Dundalk. On the morning of Monday, the last day of June, they made another movement in advance, and took up a position on the north side of the Boyne, the passage of which river King James, at the head of an army encamped on the opposite side, determined to dispute. Here, on the following day, the first of July, was fought the memorable battle of the Boyne, the well-known results of which were—the total defeat of the Irish army, the flight of James to Dublin, and forthwith to France, and the occupation of the metropolis by the troops of William. In this battle the King lost his long-trying and faithful friend and general, Duke Schomberg; the well-known Dr. George Walker, who had very unadvisedly accompanied the army from Belfast, also lost his life.<sup>18</sup>

<sup>16</sup> Several inconveniences attended this arrangement. The patent required to be renewed at the demise of every sovereign; it was also vacated by the death of the majority of the trustees, and these frequent renewals were attended with considerable anxiety and expense. Thus the first renewal of it occurred within nine years, in consequence of the decease of all the original trustees, except Mr. Hutchinson and Mr. Craghead: and, on the 28th of September, 1699, pursuant to the royal letter of the 10th of August, a new patent was issued to those ministers, in conjunction with the Rev. John M'Bride minister of Belfast, John Malcome, of Dunmurry, John Hutchinson, then of Armagh, but previously minister of Downpatrick, James Bruce, of Killileagh, Francis Fredell, who had just been translated from Donegore, in the county of Antrim, to Mary's Abbey, Dublin, and Archibald Ross, of Carrickfergus. But this new patent became void, in a little more than two years afterwards, by the death of King William; and a third, in a space of twelve years, was issued by Queen Anne, her letter bearing date, December 22, 1702, and the letters patent, the 11th of March, following. Thirteen ministers were named as trustees. See their names at Chap. XXII., Note 9.

Immediately after the battle, William moved slowly southwards, with the main body of his troops, a part of whom had

<sup>18</sup> George Walker was the son of the Rev. George Walker, who was presented to the parish of Badoney, in January, 1631, and to that of Cappagh, both in Tyrone, in September, 1636. He was born about 1618, and, it is said, was educated at the University of Glasgow, but his name does not appear in the matriculation-book, nor in the list of graduates. Nevertheless, the tradition may be true. Soon after the restoration of Charles II., he was presented to the parish of Donoughmore, also in Tyrone, which he held to his death. After the raising of the siege of Derry, he proceeded to England, by way of Glasgow and Edinburgh, where he was welcomed with the highest honours. In London, he was received most graciously by the King and Queen, and received the thanks of the House of Commons, with a grant of £5,000. He was created Doctor of Divinity by the University of Oxford, and the King had announced his intention of conferring on him the bishopric of Derry on the first vacancy; but, by a singular coincidence, it occurred only two days before his death at the Boyne. His remains were subsequently removed by his widow to the parish church of Donoughmore, where she erected a monument to his memory, in 1703. When this church was undergoing repair in 1838, his remains were found, and carefully reinterred in the same place. Besides the publications connected with the siege of Derry, which are enumerated in Note 67, Chap. XIX., he published two sermons preached by him to the garrison during the siege. One is entitled, "The Substance of a Sermon, being an encouragement for Protestants; or, a happy prospect of glorious success, &c., by Mr. Walker, Minister and Governor of the city of Derry." Licensed, June 5, 1689. London, 4to, pp. 10. Reprinted at Edinburgh, 1689. The other sermon is entitled, "The Christian Champion; or, a Second Discourse to the Besieged Protestant Soldiers in Londonderry, by that learned and loyal Christian Commander, Colonel Walker, before a vigorous sally against the French and Irish enemies." Licensed, July 30, 1689. London, 4to, pp. 10. I have seen another printed sermon, which was preached to the garrison during the siege, by the Rev. Seth Whittle, rector of Bellaghy, in the county of Londonderry. London, 1690, pp. 6. [The service rendered by Walker in the defence of Derry has been greatly over-rated. During the siege, he held but a subordinate position—being only assistant-governor. He was more than once disposed to capitulate, and his fidelity was greatly suspected by the garrison; and yet, in his "True Account," he has the assurance to style himself "Governor of Derry," and to claim almost all the credit for skill, firmness, and heroism. King William at first treated him with great respect, but soon afterwards seems to have more correctly appreciated his character. See introduction to Mackenzie's "Memorials of the Siege of Derry," pp. xii.—xx., and pp. 36, 53.]

already pushed forward and occupied the metropolis. When he reached Dublin, on Saturday, he declined taking up his residence in the city, and fixed his head-quarters at Finglass, a village on the north, about two miles distant. On Sunday, accompanied by his suite, he rode into town, and attended divine service in St. Patrick's cathedral, where the sermon was preached by the Rev. Dr. King, then chancellor of the diocese, and in the afternoon he returned to the camp. On the following day, the Episcopalian clergy then in Dublin and its vicinity, including two bishops and several other dignitaries, waited on his majesty in his tent with a congratulatory address, in which they took occasion to assure him, that during King James's residence there, they had been "guilty of no compliances but such as were the effects of prudence and self-preservation;" that they now acknowledged William to be their king, and fervently prayed "for the consummation of the good work" which he had undertaken.<sup>19</sup> The task of framing and presenting this address to the new sovereign must have been rather embarrassing to this portion of the Irish clergy. Not many months before, nearly the same parties, with the very same prelate, Dr. Dopping, bishop of Meath, at their head, had appeared before King James, and presented him with an address, expressive of their "resolution to continue firm to that loyalty which the principles of their Church obliged them to, and which, in pursuance to those principles, they had hitherto practised."<sup>20</sup> This avowal at least was true, and no doubt sincere. With the Primate and the University of Dublin at their head, the Episcopalian clergy throughout Ireland were staunch assertors of the doctrine of non-resistance. They had all entered on their benefices by subscribing the declaration, "that it is not lawful, upon any pretence whatsoever, to take arms against the King.<sup>21</sup> But to these solemnly-professed principles they “continued firm,” only so long as was consistent with “prudence and self-preservation.” While James’s power was in the ascendant in Dublin, they prayed for King James, and his reputed son, the Prince of Wales, for confusion on all his enemies, William included, and for deliverance from the heinous sin of rebellion. Bishop Dopping and the metropolitan clergy had so prayed on the last Sunday of June; but on that day week, when William’s forces had removed from among them their rightful sovereign, whom they were never to forsake or oppose, they at once adopted the new collects in use in England, praying for King William as their lawful king, whom they had a few days before denounced as a usurper, and imploring the divine blessing on the very same enterprise which they had just been reprobating as an unnatural rebellion.<sup>22</sup> In Ulster, these fluctuations in the public prayers of the Established Church were still more numerous. For, as one of themselves afterwards stated, the Episcopalian clergy in many parts of Ulster, according as the adherents of James or William obtained the ascendancy, had been “four times in one year praying forward and backward point blank contradictory to one another.”<sup>23</sup>

On the 9th of July, William shifted the camp to a place a

<sup>21</sup> It is singular that the Irish clergy were required to take this declaration long after their brethren in England had been exempted from it, which they were, so early as the year 1691, by 3 William and Mary, chap. 2. But this Act did not extend to Ireland; and, by an unseemly anomaly, the Irish clergy were still compelled by law, on every occasion of receiving promotion or taking possession of a benefice, to renew this declaration, which the Revolution, wherein many of them took so honourable a part, had rendered “a mockery and a snare.” Nor was it till thirty years afterwards that an Irish Act of Parliament, 4 Geo. I., chap. 3, set them free from this degrading formality.

<sup>22</sup> It has been alleged, so close was the collision between these two contradictory forms of prayer, that on one of the days, immediately after James had fled from Dublin, the clergy in the northern part of Dublin, which was first occupied by the English forces, were praying for William at the very same time that their brethren in the southern part, still held by the Romanists, were praying for James! But this statement wants proof.

<sup>23</sup> Leslie’s Answer to King, p. 168. He might have reduced the period within which these changes had occurred to half a year!

few miles south of Dublin. He soon after resumed operations, proceeding by Kilkenny to Waterford, being anxious to secure early possession of that town and harbour, in order not only to maintain his communication with England, but to prevent the French king from landing there, as was expected, additional forces to support the cause of James. Having effected this object, he was preparing to return to England, in consequence of the critical condition in which its affairs then stood, and had reached the neighbourhood of Dublin for that purpose, when, more favourable intelligence arriving, he rejoined the army, and soon after invested Limerick. But, encountering here a more vigorous opposition than he had anticipated, he raised the siege on the last day of August; and having appointed Lord Sydney, Sir Charles Porter (lord-chancellor), and Mr. Thomas Coningsby, lords-justices, he returned to England, and reached Windsor on the 9th of September.

Though the war in Ireland was by no means terminated, yet religion and liberty were no longer in danger, and the ultimate triumph of William's arms was only a question of time. The capitulation of Limerick, in the month of October in the following year, closed the war, and the Romanist party submitted to the King's authority, on conditions which, had they been faithfully observed, in conformity with William's reiterated directions, would have obviated many of the evils under which Ireland has since been suffering. It is no part of the object of this work, however, to detail the political history of the kingdom, except when it serves to illustrate the conduct or position of the Presbyterians. From this period their history is, in a great measure, unconnected with that of the country at large; it will not, therefore, be necessary to advert to the course of political affairs so frequently or so fully as in the period prior to the Revolution.

From the arrival of Schomberg, in the autumn of 1689, the Presbyterian ministers who had remained in the country were enabled to meet in presbyteries without further interruption, and they laboured with uncommon assiduity to repair the many evils which persecution and war had inflicted on their Church. In this work they had to contend with many difficulties. Above one-half of their congregations were destitute of ministers, most of whom had retired to Scotland, and had not yet seen it to be their duty to venture back. Many of their houses of worship had been pulled down, and their people had been scattered by the war, and impoverished by the interruption of trade. But, on the other hand, the victories of King William, his assurances of protection and toleration, and his pecuniary grant towards their support, lightened their labours, and assisted them in re-establishing their Church under more favourable auspices than they had previously enjoyed. Notwithstanding the discouragements which they had experienced since the Restoration, they had not only maintained their ground, as a Church, in Ulster, but their adherents had increased in numbers and influence. Though, for a long time, they were prohibited, in most parts of the province, from erecting places of worship, from holding Presbyteries, ordaining ministers, and even from preaching in public, yet the great body of Presbyterians adhered steadfastly to their principles, ordinances were secretly administered among them, new ministers were ordained by stealth in private houses, and even two "philosophy schools," as they were called, were established, in the counties of Antrim and Down, for the education of intending ministers. Presbyteries were also statedly held in private, as they had opportunity, and a bond of union was maintained among them by half-yearly meetings of a committee of delegates from these presbyteries. By degrees they had resumed the public celebration of their worship, and the erection of meeting-houses. But, towards the close of Charles the Second's reign, and during the early years of that of his bigoted brother, they were again forced, in many places, to suspend the public exercise of their religious rites. The "Indulgence" afterwards granted by James, for his own selfish and unconstitutional purposes, relieved them once more from these discouragements ; but this breathing-time was so brief, and it was so soon followed by the calamities of war, that it was of little avail towards the extension of their Church. One is, therefore, surprised to find that the Presbyterians at this period constituted by far the largest portion of the Protestant population in Ulster. A dignitary of the Episcopal Church, writing in the year 1692, thus estimates the relative numbers of the two Churches :—"The Nonconformists are much the most numerous portion of the Protestants in Ulster, which is called the north of Ireland. Some parishes have not ten, some not six, that come to church, while the Presbyterian meetings are crowded with thousands covering all the fields. This is ordinary in the county of Antrim especially, which is the most populous of Scots of any in Ulster (who are generally Presbyterians in that country). In other of the northern counties, the Episcopal Protestants bear a greater proportion, some more, some less. But, upon the whole, as I have it from those that live upon the place, they are not one to fifty, nor so much, but they would speak within compass."<sup>24</sup> The sixty congregations that had been formed in 1661 by the faithful ministers who were then ejected from their parishes, had now increased to one hundred, of which above eighty were provided with pastors at the breaking out of the war of the Revolution. These congregations were still associated in the same five presbyteries which existed at the Restoration, and which still bore the same designations.<sup>25</sup> The last general meeting which these presbyteries had held was in the spring of the year 1661, when they assembled, in synod, at Ballymena.<sup>26</sup> And now, at length, after a gloomy interval of thirty years, they found themselves in a condition to resume these synodical assemblies.

On the second day after the battle of the Boyne, a number of ministers from the several presbyteries met at Belfast, to consider the state of the Church, and the expediency of holding General Synods as formerly. No account of the proceedings of this conference has been preserved, except in one particular case, which, at the same time, throws some light on the religious condition of certain parts of the province. It appears that, after the retreat of the Irish army from before Derry, in which district few Protestant ministers, whether Episcopalian or Presbyterian, had been able to remain, some of the latter had occasionally occupied the parish churches on the Sabbath, where their own place of worship had been ruined, and perhaps, also, where the Conformist incumbent had not returned to his charge. It is not improbable, also, that the Presbyterian people, being the vast majority in some parishes in that neighbourhood, may, with their ministers, have unadvisedly occupied the parish church, to the exclusion of the legal clergyman. Such a charge at least was, a few years afterwards, brought against the Rev. Mr. Liston, the Presbyterian minister of Letterkenny.<sup>27</sup> He had been sent by his Presbytery to supply the congregation of Ray, at Manorcunningham, whose minister had not yet returned from Scotland, and it was alleged that he and the people there had, on a particular Sabbath, forcibly expelled the Rev. Mr. Lesly from the parish church, and then held their worship therein. This affair, which was not only illegal in itself, but calculated to bring discredit on the Presbyterian Church, was taken into consideration by the brethren assembled at Belfast, when they promptly interfered to prevent such irregularities for the future, under pain of severe censures.<sup>28</sup> At this meeting it was also resolved to resume their synodical meetings, and to hold them half-yearly, until the affairs of the Church should be placed upon a satisfactory foundation, and its discipline and government restored to their former efficiency. Accordingly, the first regular meeting of Synod was held at Belfast, on the 26th of September in this year. Unfortunately, its minutes have been lost, and no account of its proceedings is extant. From other sources of information, we learn that it was occupied chiefly in deciding on competing applications from vacant congregations for the same minister, in appointing charitable collections to be made by the people for the relief of persons in distress, in encouraging young men to enter into the ministry, in exercising discipline on immoral members of their churches, and in urging the brethren who had taken refuge in Scotland at the breaking out of the war to return to their respective charges.

Nearly fifty ministers were believed to be in that kingdom in the spring of the year 1689, whither they had been followed by a large number of their people. It is a curious circumstance, that this extraordinary influx of Irish Presbyterians gave occasion to the Scottish estates then sitting in the convention-parliament to take the first practical step towards superseding the prelatical establishment, and setting up the Presbyterian Church in its place.<sup>29</sup> In the beginning of May, the city of Glasgow was crowded with so many Ulster Presbyterians, that the meeting-houses which had been sanctioned by law for the use of the indulged ministers were not able to accommodate them on the Sabbath; while, at the same time, the parochial churches in the city were unoccupied, having been closed for many months, in consequence of the flight of their episcopal incumbents. Under these circumstances, on the 13th of that month, application was made to the convention-parliament at Edinburgh, that these Irish exiles, with their ministers, might be permitted to occupy some of these empty and deserted churches. This application was immediately granted, and the Inner High Church in the cathedral, and the Tron Church, were appropriated to their use; and two of their ministers, the Rev. Robert Craghead, of Derry, and the Rev. Thomas Kennedy, of Donoughmore, or Dungannon, with the consent of the Irish ministers then in Scotland, stately officiated therein, and sat as members of the Presbytery of Glasgow, until they returned to Ireland.<sup>30</sup> It was not till the close of the year 1690 that the Irish ministers had generally returned from Scotland to their charges.

<sup>30</sup> The following letter, for permission to these two Irish ministers to continue in Glasgow for some time longer, was addressed by the general session of that city to the Irish ministers in Scotland, about the beginning of the year 1690: "Rev. Brethren,—We heartily salute you in the Lord, and earnestly pray that God, who, in these times of such tribulation, hath strengthened you to keep the Word of His patience, may still be with you according to his promise, and lead you by His Spirit in all your deliberations and determinations about your present work and duty of the day. We cannot but acknowledge our obligations, and render hearty thanks to you for your concurrence with us (when ye met last here) to prevail with these reverend brethren, Mr. R. Craghead and Mr. Thomas Kennedy, in order to their accepting of a call from Glasgow, to labour in the work of the ministry with us, until our Presbytery shall be convinced that there is a full, free, and necessary regress for you to your flocks in Ireland. We cordially bless the Lord for the help and comfort that we have gotten by their ministry hitherto, and continue to supplicate, that if you find it necessary to send any of your number at this time to Ireland, that you may, out of commiseration to Glasgow's present desolation, spare these two reverend brethren for the present, to carry on so great and necessary a work which is now begun by them who have been so long at a stop, and must of necessity be laid by again, and be crushed in the bud if they shall be taken from us. We cease not to give thanks to the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, that by His gracious and wonderful providence has made the state of [matters] in Ireland look with a more promising face than it did of late; yet we must still hope that you will be so tender of our desolate case, and the many present sad circumstances of this place not fit to be laid open in writing, as to grant our above-mentioned suits. We have sent the bearer, John Aird [an elder], one of our number, expressly to receive your favourable answer, whereby you will further highly oblige, reverend and dear brethren, your servants and brethren in the Lord, the ministers and elders of the Common Session of Glasgow, subscribing by our Moderator and Clerk, in our name, and by our appointment."—Wodrow MSS., Advocates' Library, Edinburgh, vol. xxviii., No. 27.

On the 8th of April, 1691, the half-yearly meeting of Synod was again held in Belfast, but the record of its proceedings has also unfortunately perished. The first Synod, whose minutes are extant, is that which was held in the autumn of this year. It may not be unacceptable to give a brief account of its proceedings from this authentic source.<sup>31</sup> It met at Antrim, on the last day of September, and was attended by thirty-two ministers and twenty-one elders. The Rev. Thomas Hall, the venerable minister of Larne, who had been moderator of the previous Synod, opened the meeting by a sermon on the Song of Solomon (chap. viii., v. 12):—"My vineyard, which is mine, is before me," &c., and the Rev. John Abernethy, then minister at Moneymore, but removed by this Synod to Coleraine, was chosen moderator. The Rev. Robert Henry, minister at Carrickfergus, officiated as clerk, which office he held till he was removed to the charge of Capel Street, or Mary's Abbey congregation, in Dublin. The principal business of this Synod was connected, either with the erection of new congregations, the settlement of ministers, or their removal from one congregation to another. Several congregations entreated the Synod that their ministers, still in Scotland, might be obliged to return; but though every effort was made for that purpose,<sup>32</sup> no fewer than twenty-five <sup>31</sup> The minutes of the "General Synod of Ulster," as the supreme court of the Irish Presbyterian Church now began to be called, are complete from the year 1697, to the present time. But out of nine synods held prior to that year, there are extant only the minutes of the three which met in September, 1691, April, 1692, and June, 1694. The lost minutes were for the six synods, held respectively in September, 1690, April, 1691, October, 1692, and June, 1693, 1695, and 1696. The synod met half-yearly in 1691 and 1692: from the year 1693, it met annually, in the month of June in each year.

<sup>32</sup> The following is a copy of the resolution which this synod adopted in reference to this matter:—"The synod, now taking into consideration that several of our brethren are in Scotland, and that divers of them continue there, notwithstanding they have been written for to return; the synod doth resent these brethren's delay, where way is made for their subsistence here, contrary to their express obligation to their respective charges, ministers, who had held charges in Ireland, settled in Scottish parishes, and remained in connection with the established Church of Scotland.<sup>33</sup> This Synod was also compelled to take up the case of David Houston, by whom the Church had been troubled prior to the Revolution.<sup>34</sup> Since his return from Scotland, early in 1689, he had resumed his divisive courses, especially in the county of Antrim. In the very first Synod which was held, steps had been taken to warn the Presbyterian people of Ulster against his ministrations; and the Synod now met ordered a declaration to be published, detailing "the irregular and immoral practices whereon he had and to the Church of Ireland. And if these do further delay their present return, the Synod intends to use all means that may be effectual to bring them to a sense of their duty, and appoints each presbytery to signify this [resolution] to their respective brethren as they are concerned, and to make report to the ensuing synods as there is cause."

been formerly deposed," and stating that, "as he is henceforth to be looked upon as not of our communion, it is expected and required that none of our people do join with him in Gospel ordinances," under pain of ecclesiastical censures. This obnoxious and restless preacher must have shortly after returned once more to Scotland, for, in March, 1692, the Presbytery of Ayr were compelled to take notice of his irregular practices within their bounds, and were in communication with ministers in Antrim respecting his proceedings when in that county. The only other subject of general interest which came before this meeting related to the education of their candidates for the ministry. The Presbyterian Church, wherever settled, has been uniformly distinguished for the devoted attention it has paid to this important matter, even in the worst of times. The Synod now assembled fully sustained this high character; for, notwithstanding the urgent demand for ministers to fill their numerous vacancies, they unanimously "agreed and concluded, that none enter into the ministry without laureation," or, in other words, without having gone through a regular course of education, and taken the degree of master of arts in one of the Scottish universities.

During all these efforts to restore their Church to a state of order and efficiency, the Presbyterian ministers suffered no molestation either from the Church or the State. Though the law prohibiting their worship, and the meeting of presbyteries and synods, was still in force, and though Presbyterians were legally incapable of holding any public office, by the law requiring all functionaries to take the oath of supremacy, yet as it was held that, unless this obnoxious oath was formally tendered, no penalty was incurred by having neglected to take it, several Presbyterians were in the enjoyment of various political and municipal offices. From the beginning of the year 1687, when James's "Declaration for Liberty of Conscience" was published,<sup>35</sup> they met with no further annoyance from the High Church party—not so much because that proclamation abrogated the law, but because the other measures of that intolerant sovereign had convinced the Episcopalians of the necessity of forgetting ecclesiastical differences, and uniting with their Protestant brethren of the Presbyterian Church for the protection of themselves and their common faith. From that period both parties cordially co-operated in all the measures which had been taken in Ulster for overthrowing the power of James, and securing at once the Protestant religion and the liberties of the nation.

But scarcely had the impending danger been removed, when symptoms of a renewal of unfriendly feelings, on the part of the Episcopalian clergy towards the Presbyterians, were displayed in several quarters. Thus the celebrated Walker, in his account of the siege of Derry, too plainly betrayed an unworthy desire to deprive them of their share in the noble and successful resistance which all parties had made in that city to the power of James.<sup>36</sup> Occasionally a violent Episcopalian clergyman was found indiscreet enough to revive the dormant penalties of the law against a Presbyterian brother ; but, as yet, such bigotry met with little sympathy or support. An instance of this kind occurred in the neighbourhood of Belfast, which is too instructive to be overlooked. The Presbyterians of the town of Hillsborough, and of the adjoining parish of Anahilt, in the county of Down, not having yet obtained a settled pastor, were supplied with preaching by other ministers, under the direction of their presbytery. One of these, Mr. William Ambrose, a probationer, or one not yet ordained to the charge of a congregation, had preached to them, in his turn, in the end of March, 1692. At this period, the incumbent of the parish was the Rev. Lemuel Mathews, a noted pluralist and non-resident, who was shortly after deprived of his preferments on account of his ministerial delinquencies. For many years he had been not only chancellor, but archdeacon in one diocese, as well as a prebendary in another, holding the charge of nine separate parishes, some of them very remote from the others, in none of which had he been resident for twenty years. He happened to be at Hillsborough when Mr. Ambrose preached there. Aware of the charges impending over him, he seems to have been stimulated into a morbid activity, probably with the view of rebutting the allegation then urged against him, of neglecting his pastoral duties. Like too many ministers of all churches in similar circumstances, he strove to conceal his unworthiness under the cloak of an ostentatious zeal for the interest of his Church. He accordingly pounced upon this young preacher, drew up an information, charging him with having had the audacity to conduct public worship without the prayer-book within the parish, which he himself neglected, and procured from two justices of the peace the necessary warrant, by which he was committed to prison. Application, however, having been made to the lords-justices on his behalf, the young man was liberated, and, as Mathews himself related, "he was commanded to forbear prosecution against the said Ambrose; or other Presbyterian preacher."<sup>37</sup> Similar instances of intolerance, however, were as yet rare; and the Irish government, in accordance with the well-known wishes and promises of the King, protected the Presbyterians in the free exercise of their worship and discipline, and used every effort to procure for them a legal toleration.

The first step which King William caused to be taken towards the relief of the Irish Presbyterians was the abolition of the oath of supremacy, which had been in force in Ireland since the commencement of the reign of Elizabeth. This oath, as already stated, had not of late been enforced against the Presbyterians, but it was not the less necessary to protect them against its revival, should a season of rampant bigotry again return, as proved to be the case in the subsequent reign. Accordingly, in the English parliament which met in the end of the year 1691, an act<sup>38</sup> was passed abolishing the oath of supremacy in Ireland, and substituting in its room the same oaths of fidelity and allegiance which had been in force in England since the year 1688.<sup>39</sup> These new oaths involved no declaration or engagement which Nonconformists could not enter into as cordially and sincerely as Episcopalians; and as there was no sacramental test in force in Ireland (as was the case in England since the year 1673), this English act at once opened up to the Irish Presbyterians all public employments, civil and military, and the various municipal offices throughout the kingdom. But, strange to say, while their civil privileges were thus enlarged, the public exercise of their religious worship or church-government, though connived at, was still not only unsanctioned, but legally prohibited, under severe penalties. In England, on the contrary, among the acts of King William's first parliament was the Toleration Act,<sup>40</sup> which protected the English Protestant Dissenters in the exercise of their worship and discipline, though, owing to the Sacramental Test Act, they were still incapable of holding any public office.<sup>41</sup>

<sup>38</sup> 3 William and Mary, chap. 2. It is curious to find an act of the Irish parliament summarily repealed by an English Act. See this case referred to by Molyneux, in his "Case of Ireland being bound by Acts of Parliament in England." 18mo, 1706, p. 107, &c.

<sup>41</sup> At this period, the respective legal positions of the English and Irish Nonconformists were very singular and anomalous. In England, the worship of the Dissenter was legalised, but he was personally incapable of holding any public office, however humble, unless he would qualify for it by taking the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper in his parish church. In Ireland, on the other hand, the Dissenter was eligible to all public offices, but his worship and discipline were absolutely prohibited by law, and were only connived at in deference to the declaration and the known sentiments of King William.

It was well known that King William was most anxious to obtain from that parliament the abolition of that test, and thus to secure for his dissenting subjects the amplest toleration, and that his liberal plans were defeated by the High Church party in England. It was, therefore, to be expected, that, so soon as the state of Ireland would permit a parliament to assemble in Dublin, among its earliest acts would be one for legalising the worship of the Irish Presbyterians, whose claims on William, and on their Protestant fellow-subjects, were at least as strong as those of their English brethren.

It was not until the close of the year 1692 that, after the long interval of six-and-twenty years, the Irish parliament was able to meet. On the 5th of October it commenced its sittings, Lord Sydney being the lord-lieutenant. As Poyning's law was now interpreted, no bill could be submitted to the Irish Parliament unless previously sanctioned by the King and his ministers in England, and transmitted to the lord-lieutenant under the great seal of that kingdom. The usual practice was for the Irish privy-council to prepare an intended bill, and sometimes the Irish Parliament also voted the heads of a bill, which was then sent to London for approval and revision, and afterwards returned, to be formally enacted into a law. Accordingly, a few days after the parliament had been opened, Lord Sydney, in conformity with the King's directions, submitted to the privy-council a bill for toleration, similar to the one in force in England. But the same influence which defeated William's generous policy towards the English Dissenters arrested his measures for the protection of the Irish Presbyterians. The bishops succeeded in obtaining a vote of the lords' committee for religion, that there should be no toleration conceded in Ireland unless the Sacramental Test, as it existed in England, were at the same time enacted, by which the Presbyterians would have been turned out of all the public employments, and rendered incapable for the future of holding even the humblest offices. Nay, their bigotry was so extreme, that they called for additional burdens to be laid on their Protestant countrymen, who had freely shed their blood for their common faith, and without whose co-operation they would, in all probability, have been exiles from their native land. They demanded that all persons holding office should be compelled to take the communion in their respective parish churches, not merely once after promotion, as required by the English act, but three times every year; and they further very magnanimously voted, that no Presbyterian minister should presume to preach against the Established Church, under very severe penalties. This opposition, coupled with the fact that the bishops constituted the majority of the House of Lords, induced the lord-lieutenant to return the bill to England, with a recommendation that the Sacramental Test should be added to it before it was transmitted under the great seal. The King, however, would not consent to curtail so seriously the measure of religious liberty which he had designed for the Irish Presbyterians; and, notwithstanding Lord Sydney's recommendation, the bill was returned in its original form.<sup>42</sup> But, in the meantime, circumstances had occurred which prevented it from being formally laid before parliament. The violent dispute which soon after occurred between the lord-lieutenant and the Irish commons, on a question of privilege connected with a money bill, rose to such a height, that he indignantly closed the session by an abrupt prorogation, and the question of toleration, for the present, fell to the ground.

At this period, the want of an act of toleration was not

See also Boyse's "Case of the Protestant Dissenters, in reference to a Bill of Indulgence vindicated," &c., in his Works, vol. ii., p. 364. These writers merely state the fact that William approved of the bill, and retransmitted it in its original form. The other particulars, given above, are taken from Bishop Marsh's diary, preserved in MS. in his library in Dublin, and from a letter of Lord Sydney to the Earl of Nottingham, Secretary of State, which I found in the State Paper Office in London.

practically felt by the Presbyterians. Public opinion, and the favour of the executive, supplied the place of a legislative enactment. No one ventured to molest them in the enjoyment of their religious rights without encountering general reprobation; and having now the avenues to office thrown open to them, they rose rapidly to influence and power, especially in the larger towns. They lived in undisturbed amity with their Episcopalian neighbours, both having fought in the same ranks against their common foe, and being equally zealous in maintaining the present settlement of affairs in Ireland. No doubt some of the northern bishops were already beginning to be jealous of their numbers and growing influence, and occasionally a bigoted clergyman might be heard railing against them as schismatics; but, generally speaking, the parochial incumbents and the Presbyterian ministers cordially co-operated in repairing the disastrous results of the war on the religious habits of their people, avoiding polemical encounters, and all invidious attempts at mutual proselytism.

This mutual amity was first violated by the new bishop of Derry, Dr. William King. This learned and able divine, in his controversy with Dean Manby, had already indicated but too clearly his unfriendly feelings towards the Presbyterians.<sup>43</sup> Prior to the Revolution, he had stood forth as the assertor of all the usual High Church dogmas, boldly advocating the principles of passive obedience and non-resistance, and declaring his readiness to die a hundred deaths rather than violate the declaration so often renewed by him—"That it was not lawful to take up arms, on any pretence whatsoever, against the King." Even after the inhabitants of Derry had, in opposition to the counsels of Bishop Hopkins, nobly shut the gates of their city against the popish regiment sent to hold it for King James, Dr. King, in a meeting of the Dublin clergy, had denounced that act as rank rebellion. And when that perfidious sovereign had arrived in Dublin, after fleeing from England, and after William and Mary had been placed upon his abdicated throne, he was among the episcopal clergy who congratulated James on his arrival, and assured him of their unalterable loyalty to his person and government. But when the Irish Parliament had repealed the acts of settlement, and placed in jeopardy the Established Church, Dr. King unceremoniously abjured the slavish principles he had so recently and so zealously professed; and being suspected by his former associates of holding communication with the supporters of the Revolution in England and Ulster, he was imprisoned by James for nearly half a year, and exposed to considerable privations. The battle of the Boyne having delivered him from danger, he welcomed King William as cordially as he had done King James, and attached himself to the victorious party with ostentatious alacrity and zeal.<sup>44</sup> His seasonable conversion to Whig principles, joined to his acknowledged learning and talents, marked him out for promotion, and, in January, 1691, he was deservedly advanced to the see of Derry.

Dr. King, unquestionably, proved a diligent and exemplary bishop. But, unfortunately, he brought with him to the north all his former prejudices against the Presbyterians, though he took care not to display them too prematurely or too offensively. He laboured at first very assiduously in supplying his diocese with efficient ministers, repairing the parish churches, and promoting education, both secular and religious. Had he contented himself with labours such as these, he would undoubtedly have advanced the interests of his Church in that part of the province more successfully than by the system of proselytism to which he now had recourse. He became ambitious of distinguishing his episcopate, by bringing over to the Establishment the Presbyterians, who constituted by far the largest portion of the Protestant population of his diocese. Being well-grounded in their own principles of ecclesiastical order, they were not averse to discuss the respective claims of Presbytery and Prelacy with their Episcopalian neighbours, and in these discussions they maintained their peculiar views with a firmness and pertinacity which rendered them, in the bishop's eyes, "mighty insolent."<sup>45</sup> He prudently resolved, however, not to enter on the question of church-government in the first instance, for this, among other reasons, as he very candidly owned to a brother prelate, "because the subject is new and ticklish, especially in respect of the foreign churches, and must be handled with a wary hand."<sup>46</sup> Evading, therefore, this dangerous ground of controversy, he preferred directing his efforts to convince the Presbyterians that their modes of worship were not only defective, but of mere human invention, and without any warrant from Scripture, while those of the Episcopal Church were alone founded on the Word of God. This line of attack was ingeniously contrived to out-flank his opponents, by pointing against themselves their favourite weapon against the liturgical forms of the Conformists, that they were destitute of a warrant from the inspired record. In the end of the year 1693, Bishop King unfolded these views in a pamphlet, which he entitled, "A Discourse concerning the Inventions of Men in the Worship of God." He did not at first formally publish this work; he contented himself with sending copies of it privately to the Presbyterian ministers of his diocese, and distributing it extensively among the members of their congregations."<sup>47</sup>

<sup>45</sup> In a letter to Lloyd, bishop of Lichfield and Coventry, preserved among Bishop King's unpublished correspondence, now in Trinity College library, he thus writes:—"When I came to this diocese, I found the Dissenters mighty insolent, and one of our communion could no sooner get into their company but they immediately fell upon him, sometimes scoffing, and sometimes arguing with him; and our own people had little to say for themselves, but that they had an establishment by law, and it did not contradict Scripture." That this account of the alleged insolence of the Presbyterians is greatly exaggerated, is obvious from the very next statement in the letter, which is altogether rhetorical, and not to be depended on. He immediately adds—"But since my book came out they are mute; no persuasions will prevail with them to dispute or talk of religion, and the members of our Church insult over them on this account." Yet the reader will see that his book called forth no less than four replies from the Presbyterians, and all published before he wrote this letter! These were certainly very convincing proofs of having been struck mute by his book.

This clever and plausible performance is written in a spirit of affected friendship for Presbyterians; and being free from unseemly bitterness, and harsh or irritating epithets, it was calculated to make a deeper impression on the minds of its readers than was likely to result from its arguments alone.<sup>48</sup> It has been highly commended by Episcopalian writers, as much for its candour and fairness, as for its strength of reasoning. Yet it is, in reality, a very disingenuous and offensive work, refuting puerile objections disowned by Presbyterians, while it is full of unworthy insinuations and unfounded charges. The subject is fully and perspicuously treated. The bishop divides the "worship of God" into these five parts—praises, prayers, hearing, bodily worship, and the Lord's Supper, omitting any notice of baptism. Under each of those heads, he first lays down what he regards as the directions of Scripture relating to it, he then explains and contrasts the practise of his own Church and that of the Presbyterians, and concludes with earnest addresses to these four classes of persons in his diocese—the conforming clergy, the dissenting ministers, the conforming laity, and the dissenting laity. In illustrating the the practice of Presbyterians in public worship and other matters, he hazarded several statements, as matters of fact, which were afterwards proved to be either greatly exaggerated, or altogether erroneous. Thus, he alleged that the Presbyterian people in general were very inadequately instructed by their ministers in the principles of religion; that the Scriptures were scarcely ever read in their religious assemblies; that few of them attended public worship; that the congregations generally sat at public prayer; and that the Lord's Supper was culpably undervalued and neglected, being celebrated only at very distant intervals.<sup>49</sup> In his concluding address to the Presbyterian laity, he thus grouped together these alleged defects in their worship, in a passage which, at the same time, will exhibit the spirit of the work, and afford another illustration of the Psalmist's remark—"The words of his mouth were smoother than butter, but war was in his heart: his words were softer than oil, yet were they drawn swords."<sup>50</sup> "Lastly," writes Bishop King to the Presbyterians, "I have one thing which I would more especially request of you, that you would believe that I sincerely and heartily desire and study the good of your souls, and that I have in this treatise endeavoured to promote it, and, by God's assistance, ever shall, in all my undertakings. And if you had the same apprehensions with me, you would not wonder at my concern in this matter; for how is it possible that any man that has a zeal for the purity of God's worship, should not have his spirit moved within him to see a well-meaning people so strangely misled as to content themselves to meet together, perhaps for some years, with a design to worship God, and yet hardly ever see or hear anything of God's immediate appointment in their meetings. Now, to my thoughts, this is manifestly the case of many of you; since a man may frequent some meetings amongst you for some years, and never hear a prayer, a psalm, or chapter, which has been immediately dictated by God, and never be called on to bow his knee to God, or see either minister or people address themselves to him in that humble posture. Lastly, never see any body offer to administer, or desire to receive the food of life in the Lord's Supper. These are melancholy reflections to me, who believe that God has required these in His worship; and, therefore, I hope you will take it in good part, that I endeavour to restore them to you."<sup>51</sup>

<sup>48</sup> King, in his letter to Lloyd, referred to in a preceding note (45), thus candidly acknowledges that there was nothing original in this discourse, or his subsequent vindication of it:—"I cannot pretend to be the author of any of the arguments in them, the whole was an effect of my reading. Mr. Thorndike gave me the notions, and all that I can pretend to is, the taking them out of his obscure stile and method, and putting them into a more modern dress."

<sup>49</sup> Various circumstances conspired to protract the intervals between the celebration of the Lord's Supper in a congregation, such as the want of a suitable place of worship, the opposition of local authorities, &c., of all of which the bishop took no notice. The expense attendant on its administration also contributed to prevent congregations from frequently celebrating it. To give an idea of the expense, the following notice, taken from the old Session-book of the congregation of Burt, near Derry, will, doubtless, surprise many of my readers. On the 25th June, 1694, the minister and session resolved that the Lord's Supper should be administered in that congregation. For this purpose it was necessary to send a person all the way to Belfast to purchase the wine, consisting of 36 pottles of claret; and two other persons were authorised to provide the wheat, and get it ground and baked. The expenses of this communion amounted to above six guineas, a large sum in those days. The following are the items:—Wine, £4 17s. 6d.; carriage, 12s.; wheat, 8s.; grinding, 1s. 2d.; baking, 2s. 6d.; cask, 2s. 8d.; tickets, 3s. 6d.; nails, 6d.—total, £6 7s. 10d.

A work such as this, and coming from such a quarter, even though circulated in private, could not long remain in obscurity, or without an answer. Contrary to his own wish, as the bishop himself alleges in a subsequent vindication of it, this "Discourse" was immediately reprinted in London, and soon became known throughout the kingdom. The first person who replied to it was the Rev. Joseph Boyse, of Dublin, whose writings, in vindication of the Irish Presbyterians against the Rev. George Walker, and against Bishop King himself, in his controversy with Manby, have been noticed in the preceding chapter.<sup>52</sup> In the beginning of the year 1694, he published "Remarks on a late Discourse of William, Lord-Bishop of Derry, concerning the Inventions of Men in the Worship of God."<sup>53</sup> In his reply, he follows the bishop closely through all the parts of his work, and not only refutes his reasoning, but exposes the inaccuracy of those statements which were injurious to the character of the Presbyterians. Mr. Boyse was no unworthy opponent of the bishop. Fully equal to him in learning and dialectic skill, he displayed acuteness and perspicuity of no ordinary kind, while his pleasing and vigorous style, remarkable for that period, added much to the cogency of his reasoning.

This reply was soon after followed by a similar work, though not of equal value, from the pen of the venerable Presbyterian minister of Derry, the Rev. Robert Craghead, who, after having been minister of Donoughmore, or Castlefin, in the county of Donegal, for above thirty years, had been removed to that city in the year 1690. It bears this long title, which is, at the same time, an analysis of its contents—"An answer to a late book, entitled, 'A Discourse concerning the Inventions of Men in the Worship of God,' by William, Lord-Bishop of Derry. Wherein the author's arguments against the manner of public worship performed by Protestant Dissenters, are examined, and by plain Scripture and reason confuted; his mistakes as to matters of fact detected, and some important truths concerning the spirit of prayer and external adoration, &c., vindicated."<sup>54</sup> In his dedication to "The mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of Derry, of the Presbyterian persuasion," he apologises for being compelled to vindicate their worship, and defend himself and them, whom the bishop, he says, "had made black as heathens, for denying due adoration to God, and casting His Word out of our assemblies." "And since," he adds, "we are now set out to the world as worse than the most degenerate and barbarous people that ever called themselves Christians, and thereby a clothing of wild beasts forced upon us, as so many primitive Christians, to enrage their devourers, it is presumed no one can take offence if, by a just vindication, we strip ourselves of this covering, that the world may see we are no savages." But, though thus driven by necessity to the work of self-defence, this excellent minister had no relish for controversy, especially on points not affecting the fundamental truths of the Gospel. "I do freely declare to you, my worthy and beloved friends, that the constraint of putting such a book into your hands on so mean a subject, ministereth to me some melancholy reflections." He regrets that this first product of his pen should be occupied with a "dispute of forms so remote from the power of godliness;" and he feelingly owns that the peculiar circumstances of his congregation in Derry, who, by the wonderful issue of the siege, were "as a firebrand plucked out of the fire," called "for things more profitable and spiritual than mere jejune forms."

Mr. Craghead was fitted to shine more as a writer on experimental and practical religion, as his other writings evince,<sup>55</sup> than as a controversialist. His exposure of the bishop's mistakes and sophistries is, no doubt, satisfactory; but he is inferior to Mr. Boyse in the arrangement and illustration of his topics, and in bringing his arguments to bear on the objections of his opponent. He is, besides, altogether deficient in the graces of style, and in this respect his work contrasts unfavourably with those both of the bishop and Mr. Boyse. Though Mr. Craghead had not seen the "Remarks" of the latter when he wrote his "Answer," he also contradicts, in a still more pointed manner the bishop's misstatements relative to the religious ignorance of the Presbyterians, their disuse of the Scripture, in divine service, their non-attendance on public worship, and their neglect of the Lord's Supper. On this last topic he very feelingly reminds his accuser of the unwelcome fact, that their non-observance of that ordinance in many districts was to be attributed, not to wilful neglect, but to the intolerance of their episcopal oppressors. "It's rare to celebrate it more seldom than once a year in any congregation of our communion, where the congregations are brought to any tolerable settlement. I grant the time was, that the people of our persuasion, both ministers and others, were so pursued by bishops' courts, because of their meeting together, and adhering to their sound principles, that some were imprisoned, many excommunicated, and their families broken, others hunted as partridges on the mountains, and especially, if they were found celebrating the Lord's Supper; if these be the times that the author chargeth us with the guilt of seldom celebrating, it is not fair, for he knoweth, as well as I, who were to blame, and I know where the righteous God placeth the guilt." Mr. Craghead closes his work by a very affectionate address: "To all my well-beloved friends of the Presbyterian congregation at Londonderry," in which, "being weary of these empty debates," he earnestly exhorts them to stand fast in the faith of the Gospel, and to adorn their profession by unblemished lives.

In the meantime, before this "Answer" by Mr. Craghead had appeared, the bishop had resumed the pen. In the beginning of May, 1694, he republished his "Discourse," in a second edition, and appended to it a reply to Mr. Boyse's "Remarks," under the title of "An Admonition to the Dissenting Inhabitants of the Diocese of Derry."<sup>56</sup> In this tract, he only defends his reasoning against Mr. Boyse's exceptions, but labours to sustain his alleged facts by an elaborate array of calculations, founded on statistics which are themselves by no means sufficiently vouched. He assumes that the Presbyterians in the diocese of Derry amounted to above thirty thousand, and that they possessed only nine churches for their accommodation ; yet, from other sources, we know that there were nearly twenty congregations within the same limits, the greater number of which had ordained ministers, although several had never obtained permission, or were unable to erect churches, and some of those erected had been laid in ruins by the war.<sup>57</sup> The bishop does not venture even to guess at the number of Episcopalians in his diocese, but it must have been very limited ; he contents himself with stating that he had under his charge forty-two congregations and as many churches. Taking these imperfect statistics and other materials as the foundation of his calculations, he obtains the following startling results, which he gravely publishes as unquestionable matters of fact :—"That there was four times more Scripture read in the Episcopalian churches in one Sabbath-day than in the Presbyterian churches in a whole year—that hardly one Presbyterian in ten committed to memory the Shorter Catechism, and only one in five hundred retained it—that in the three years since he had been appointed bishop, there were as many Episcopalian communicants in a single parish church as in all the Presbyterian churches in twice that time—and that the Lord's Supper had been administered to the people under his charge nearly four hundred times in three years and two months, while among the Presbyterians it had been celebrated only nine times in seven years !” It is scarcely necessary to add, that these conclusions were far from being correct, being not only founded on inaccurate information, but many elements being omitted which would have greatly modified the result. But it would be out of place here to enter on their examination.

<sup>56</sup> The title in full was—"A Discourse concerning the Inventions of Men in the Worship of God. By William, Lord-Bishop of Derry. For the instruction of his Diocese. The second edition, reviewed by the author. Together with an Admonition to the Dissenting Inhabitants of the Diocese of Derry, concerning Mr. Jos. Boyse's Remarks," &c. Dub., 1694, 18mo, pp. 189. It has since been frequently reprinted in this form in London and elsewhere. An edition appeared even at Boston, in New England, in 1712.

<sup>57</sup> In the ecclesiastical census of Ireland, taken in the year 1834, the Presbyterian population was vastly underrated through the tricks of the Episcopalian enumerators, who, in many parts of Ulster, merely asked whether the parties were Protestants or Catholics, and then unceremoniously claimed all the former as Episcopalians. In that year, the Presbyterians in the diocese of Derry amounted to nearly 120,000, and their places of worship to above 80.

No sooner had this “Admonition” appeared, than Mr. Boyse was urged, especially by ministers in Ulster, to continue the controversy. In the beginning of the year 1695, he accordingly published “A Vindication of the Remarks on the Bishop of Derry’s Discourse concerning Human Inventions,”<sup>58</sup> in which he reviews, with great minuteness, all the bishop’s calculations and results, and shows very convincingly how inaccurate and insufficient they were. After this publication, the controversy was suspended for nearly a year, owing to the bishop’s other avocations, and probably also to ill health. But, in the spring of the following year, 1696, he returned to the subject, and in “A Second Admonition to the Dissenting Inhabitants of the Diocese of Derry,”<sup>59</sup> he once more endeavoured to support both his facts and his arguments against the animadversions of Mr. Boyse, with occasional references to those of Mr. Craghead. To this tract no answer was returned by Mr. Boyse; but Mr. Craghead replied to it in 1697, in “An Answer to the Bishop of Derry’s Second Admonition to the Dissenting Inhabitants in his Diocese, especially as to matters of fact relating to the Public Worship of God, wherein his misrepresentations are again discovered.”<sup>60</sup> In this pamphlet, he produces a number of satisfactory vouchers, expressly contradicting several of the bishop’s alleged facts, and he proves how unfounded were most of his charges against the Presbyterians of his diocese.

<sup>60</sup> [Edin.] 1697, 4to, pp. 106. It is dedicated to James Lennox, Esquire, mayor of Derry, one of his elders, and contains, among other letters, one from Mr. Boyse, closing the controversy between him and the bishop.

This second admonition was likely to open a new and fertile source of controversy between the contending parties—the question of church-government. For, shortly after its appearance, there was published an anonymous work, entitled, “A Modest Apology, occasioned by the importunity of the Bishop of Derry, who presseth for an answer to a query, stated by himself in his Second Admonition, concerning joining in the Public Worship established by law. By a Minister of the Gospel, at the desire of some Presbyterian Dissenters.”<sup>61</sup> In this little work, some of the usual arguments against prelatical government, as against a prescribed liturgy, with its kneeling at the Lord’s Supper, and the sign of the cross in baptism, and against the reordination of ministers by the Established Church, are stated in a condensed form, and in a popular style. It at first elicited no reply; but a second edition having been published five years afterwards, an anonymous writer, calling himself “An episcopal minister, in the diocese of Derry,” ventured into the field, and, in 1702, published a short and feeble answer, entitled, “Remarks upon the Book called the Modest Apology.”<sup>62</sup> With this pamphlet the controversy occasioned by the bishop’s “Discourse” may be said to have terminated, after it had called forth nine different publications, and had extended over a period of as many years.

As in nearly all similar cases, much good, and not a little evil, resulted from this protracted controversy. In the former point of view, it confirmed the Presbyterians in the conviction that their simpler forms of worship were in closer accordance with the Word of God, and much freer from “human inventions,” than those of the Episcopal Church. And it no doubt stimulated them to pay increased attention to some things on which the bishop had animadverted, such as the catechising of children, the erection of places of worship, the settlement of additional ministers, the more becoming celebration of public worship, and the more punctual administration of the Lord's Supper.<sup>63</sup> On the other hand, this controversy, which grew the keener the longer it continued, occasioned many evils, which perhaps more than counterbalanced all the good that had resulted from it. It excited animosities among Protestants at a time when union and mutual confidence were most desirable. It occasioned much irritating declamation from the pulpit on both sides, which would not have otherwise occurred; the bishop, on the one hand, following up his attacks on Presbyterian worship, by preaching against the sin of schism,<sup>64</sup> and the Presbyterian ministers, on the other hand, defending their position as Nonconformists, and pressing their objections to the constitution and worship of the Established Church. Moreover, there can be little doubt that Bishop King became more and more embittered against the Presbyterians, whom he had found not so pliant as he had expected, and who were so numerous and influential in his diocese. One great object of his policy, after this discussion had closed, was to lessen their influence by every means in his power; and, in so doing, he hesitated not to have recourse to most unworthy expedients. He prejudiced the government against them by exaggerated accounts of their opposition to the Established Church; he laboured to deprive the ministers of the royal grant, or, at least, to have it distributed in an invidious and unpopular manner; he strenuously resisted their obtaining an act of toleration on the liberal terms which the King and his ministry were anxious to grant; and he never ceased till he had succeeded in depriving the Presbyterians of the civil privileges which they were now enjoying, from the repeal of the oath of supremacy, and in subjecting them to the same galling disabilities under which their brethren in England then lay.

<sup>63</sup> Bishop King himself, in his letter to Bishop Lloyd, in 1696, referred to in previous notes, boasts of having "forced the Presbyterians to reform many things," in which there was some truth, and, he adds, "to speak much more moderately of us and our worthies than formerly." This latter good effect of the controversy was, however, soon neutralised by the vehemence with which the bishop now attacked them from the pulpit.

<sup>64</sup> Bishop King, writing to two of his episcopal correspondents, thus alludes to his sermons at a parochial visitation of his diocese, held shortly after the close of this controversy:—"I had great crowds of Dissenters everywhere, and entertained them with a discourse, generally showing the no-necessity of a separation on their own principles."

"The subject was the sin of making sects, and the no necessity of it. I examined all their pretences, and showed them, if all true, they would not, according to Scripture, justify a separation."

It is worthy of remark, that while Bishop King was thus censuring the alleged neglect of the Presbyterian ministers, and affecting to be most anxious for their reformation, he was employed in the visitation of an adjoining diocese, which disclosed so many gross offences among the beneficed clergy, that one would think his reforming efforts might have been exhausted within the pale of his own Church.

The state of the united diocese of Down and Connor had become a public scandal to the Church in Ulster, whether Episcopal or Presbyterian. The bishop had not been within his charge for twenty years.<sup>65</sup> He had resided nearly all that time at Hammersmith, near London, where he had become so naturalised, that his title as Bishop of Down and Connor had been sunk in the more appropriate one of—the Bishop of Hammersmith. Here, too, he became noted for his simoniacal practices, openly disposing of the benefices and preferments in his gift to the highest bidder. This evil example of the bishop produced its unavoidable results among his clergy. Many of them were partakers with him in his sin of simony, several were charged with incontinence, and many with non-residence and neglect of their pastoral duties. Various efforts had been made, immediately after the Revolution, to remedy these evils. Applications were made to the Irish government, and to the archbishop of Armagh, by the nobility and gentry of those dioceses, to compel this unworthy prelate to reside and discharge his episcopal duties. But he pertinaciously resisted every attempt. So early as the year 1691, it was proposed to appoint a coadjutor to him in the see; but Tillotson, archbishop of Canterbury, when this proposal was made to him by Boyle, the Irish primate, resolutely opposed it, "as an example of very ill consequences;" and he very properly declared, that it would be "much fitter to have the bishoprick made void for the bishop's scandalous neglect of his charge."<sup>66</sup> Yet, although the authorities both in Church and State were thus fully cognisant of the evil, and of the only effectual remedy, it was above two years more before any step was actually taken.

At length, in October, 1693, a memorial, from the respectable portion of the clergy of Down and Connor, was presented to Lord Sydney, the lord-lieutenant, praying for a speedy redress of the grievances under which the Church had so long been suffering in that part of Ulster. As the ordinary resources of ecclesiastical law had been tried in vain, it was found necessary to have recourse to the royal prerogative to meet this extraordinary emergency. Accordingly, in the following month of December, an ecclesiastical commission from the crown passed the great seal, empowering Dopping, bishop of Meath, Wiseman, bishop of Dromore, and King, bishop of Derry, to hold a royal visitation of these dioceses, and giving them full powers to admonish, suspend, and deprive every clerical delinquent, from the bishop down to the humblest vicar, whose guilt should be established to their satisfaction. In the end of February, 1694, Bishops Dopping and King opened this commission at Lisburn, and, with the exception of a short recess at Easter, they continued their sittings to the middle of April. It will be enough to state briefly, from an authentic unpublished document,<sup>67</sup> the results of this unusual, though salutary exercise of the royal prerogative. The chief offender, Dr. Thomas Hackett, the bishop, was deprived of his sees "for selling of ecclesiastical livings and preferments in his gift, and many other crimes committed by him in the exercise of his episcopal jurisdiction."<sup>68</sup> The archdeacon of Down, the Rev. Lemuel Mathews, who was also chancellor of that diocese, and prebendary of Cairncastle, in the diocese of Connor, was deprived of his archdeaconry, and suspended from his other offices for enormous neglect of his cures, continued non-residence, and other things acted and committed by him."<sup>69</sup> The dean of Connor, the Rev. Thomas Ward, was deprived of his deanery "for the crime of adultery, and incontinence of life, amongst other things alleged and proved against him." The prebendary of Kilroot, the Rev. William Milne, was also among the delinquents who were deprived of office. The history of this individual is singular and instructive. He was a native of Scotland and a Presbyterian, and

<sup>68</sup> Among "these other crimes" was the following, as specified in a letter from the two commissioners to the primate, which I found in the State Paper Office, London:—"For giving a false certificate to Mr. Moore, who after turned Papist, that he had subscribed to the doctrine and discipline of the Church, and done other things by law required; whereas Moore, in his depositions upon oath, confessed that he had done none of them, but that they were procured for him by Sir Robert Hamilton, and sent him out of England under the bishop's hand and seal." See Moore's case in Chap. XIX., Note 8.

<sup>69</sup> The commissioners, in a letter to the lords-justices, give the following statement of his offences:—"1. That, as archdeacon of Down, he had four cures without any vicarages endowed, and five cures as prebend of Cairncastle, in the diocese of Connor, and for above twenty years never resided on any of them. 2. That he never had any resident curates on some of them; that on others he had only nominal curates to answer at visitations, but not to perform any offices; on others, curates that were altogether insufficient and unfit; that, where he had curates, he did not allow them a sufficient maintenance, and, where he promised them an allowance, he did not pay them. 3. That catechising, visiting the sick, and administration of the Sacraments, were so neglected, that many left the Church, and turned Presbyterians and Papists;" State Paper Office. Mr. Mathews was the only one deprived by this commission who offered any resistance. He appealed against the sentence to the court of chancery, both in England and Ireland, and applied for a commission of delegates to review his case, but without success. In addition to the account of the proceedings against him, referred to in Note 37 above, he published, in 1704, "The Argument of Archdeacon Mathews for a Commission of Delegates," &c. 4to, pp. 207, 208.

he had been licensed in Aberdeen as a preacher or probationer. In the year 1657, he came over to Ireland, and was ordained by the Presbytery of Antrim to the charge of the parish of Islandmagee, near Carrickfergus. When Prelacy was restored, he was one of the very few ministers who abandoned the Presbyterian for the Episcopal Church. Having stooped to receive reordination from Bishop Jeremy Taylor, he was inducted into the rectory of his former parish, Islandmagee, in March, 1662, and in the following year he received, in addition, the prebend of Kilroot. Of the ministers who conformed at that trying period, the early annalist of the Presbyterian Church had remarked, that "they turned other men than before," and that they became "worldly and proud."<sup>70</sup> This visitation proved that the prebendary of Kilroot furnished no exception to this remark, as the following account of his case will show :—"For intemperance, incontinency of life, and neglect of his cures ; he was first publicly admonished for his intemperance ; secondly, for the neglect of his cures he was suspended during their majesties' pleasure ; and, in the last place, being put upon his purgation for his incontinency of life, he failed therein ; and, therefore, was declared convicted of that crime objected against him, and thereupon was deprived. But, in regard of his great age, poverty, and long-being in the Church and of the clergy, the commissioners have declared it, in their opinion, to be reasonable, that he may have twenty pounds per annum pension out of said prebend during his life"—a very considerate, though undeserved, act of mercy.<sup>71</sup> The treasurer of Connor, the Rev. Thomas Jones, was charged with simony by public fame, and being put upon his purgation, cleared himself of that charge by compurgators. But he was suspended from office for neglecting the cure of his several parishes, among which were those of Donegore and Kilbride.<sup>72</sup> The precentor of Connor, the Rev. William Armer, was excommunicated for being absent in England from his charge without leave, and for having committed the cure of the parish of Ballymoney to a Mr. Cole, a blind man, and unable to discharge its duties. Besides these delinquents, processes were instituted against the Rev. Andrew Charleton, chancellor of Connor, the Rev. Philip Mathews, archdeacon of Connor, the Rev. John M'Neal, dean of Down, and others ; but, for want of adequate proof, the suits were abandoned, and the parties dismissed. These were only the most glaring cases. Many others of the clergy might have been tried for immorality and neglect of duty before this commission ; for, as the commissioners acknowledge, in one of their letters from Lisburn to the primate, " If we would give way to the passions and animosities of the clergy here against one another, who are not sparing in their informations against their brethren, I believe we might deprive, or at least suspend, one-half of the clergy."<sup>73</sup> But as that would continue our stay here very long, so we pity their imprudences, and proceed against few, but such as are scandalously obnoxious, ut metus ad omnes, pœna ad paucos, pertingat."<sup>74</sup> By this vigorous and wholesome discipline, which was only too long delayed, the Episcopal Church was purified, and her character vindicated, the cause of religion and moral-

<sup>72</sup> The following melancholy case, caused by Jones's neglect and avarice, contributed probably to render his sentence more severe than it would otherwise have been. It is taken from the MS. in the British Museum already referred to. "There being a most sad and remarkable instance of one Mr. Ogilby, a Scotch clergyman, and a refugee, who, being his curate in one of his livings, by the ill-treatment, bad usage, small allowance, and ill-payment of his salary by the said Mr. Jones, laboured under so great necessity, that, out of a melancholy consideration of his hard circumstances, made himself away, and became felo de se, by cutting his own throat."

<sup>73</sup> It is singular to find the archbishop of Armagh, Dr. Lindsay, quoting, in a letter to Dean Swift, in 1713, the remark of Archbishop Tillotson, "That if he should hearken to what the Irish clergy said of one another, there was not a man of the whole country that ought to be preferred."—Swift's "Works," Scott's edition, vol. xvi., p. 113.

ity was promoted in this part of the province, while the authorities in both Church and State anticipated from it a large accession of Presbyterians to the Established Church. The lords-justices of Ireland, in transmitting to the archbishop of Canterbury the accounts of this visitation, which they had received from the commissioners, the bishops of Meath and Derry, conclude by saying—"We have reason to hope for a great reformation of manners in those párts, and the reduction of a great many Dissenters to the bosom of the Church."<sup>75</sup>

<sup>75</sup> From the original in the State Paper Office, London. The following passage, in a letter of the bishops of Meath and Derry, from Lisburn, to Lord Capel, one of the lords-justices, also preserved in the State Paper Office, is curious and instructive, as giving their view of the peculiar state of these dioceses, and containing excellent advice on the choice of a suitable person to fill the vacant see:—"The dioceses are large in compass, filled with Dissenters of whom many have been made so by the bishop's and clergy's neglect; the two cathedrals, and most of the parish churches, out of repair; the diocese of Down being a key and inlet to the malcontents of Scotland, and the Presbyterians that come from thence; and in one part of it, there being one Houston, a clergyman, that preaches up the Solemn League and Covenant, accusing the people of Scotland of perjury, in not sticking to their league, and having a congregation of five hundred resolute fellows that adhere to him. So the disorders of this place will require a learned, moderate, prudent, and well-tempered person for the cure of them." The first appointment of a bishop was made in conformity with this judicious advice; but, unfortunately, Bishop Foley died before he had been a year in this see. The next appointment, as the reader will see in the following chapter, was in direct opposition to it, Bishop Wadlington being a violent, hot-headed man, and a bigoted High-Churchman.

LORD SYDNEY, the lord-lieutenant, after his rupture with the commons, and the abrupt prorogation of parliament in November, 1692, became so unpopular, that he was soon after recalled. In the beginning of the following year, the government of Ireland was again entrusted to three lords-justices. Two of these, to wit, Sir Cyril Wyche and Mr. Duncombe, were favourable to what was called the Irish party, while the other, Lord Capel, who was also the principal person in the administration, supported the English interest. It is not easy to comprehend the distinguishing principles of these two parties, both of whom were Protestants, and ardent supporters of the Revolution settlement. The Irish party appear to have taken their name from a professed desire to maintain inviolate the articles of the treaty of Limerick, and protect the Irish, who had surrendered on the faith of it. Had they been firm and sincere in maintaining this line of policy, it would have conferred on them, as a party, the highest honour. But it is to be feared that this profession was little more than a party badge, adopted with the view of casting reproach on the other party, as the only violators of that treaty; for almost all the departures from its stipulations, of which the Romanists justly complained, are equally chargeable upon them as upon their political opponents. This Irish party were, moreover, staunch supporters of High Church principles, save those of passive obedience and non-resistance. They were consequently hostile to the Presbyterians; and, though far from being Jacobites, they ultimately subsided into what is well known as the Tory party. From the beginning of William's reign, they may be considered, when out of office, as the opposition of that period, arrayed generally against the measures of the English administration. The English party, on the other hand, acted in unison with the authorities in England, who were sometimes at variance with the King with regard to the treaty of Limerick, and too much disposed to depart from its engagements. They were, in general, the friends of toleration and of religious liberty, though sincerely attached to the Established Church, and were nearly identical with the English Whig party of the Revolution school. With this latter party the Presbyterians steadily co-operated.

As the lords-justices belonged to these opposite parties, their difference of opinion very much impeded the government of the country. It encouraged factious proceedings on various questions; and, as Lord Capel suffered much from ill health, his colleagues carried out, with obvious reluctance, the policy of King William and his English ministers, and, in some respects, they appear to have actually thwarted his views.

A circumstance connected with the royal bounty grant to the Presbyterians will illustrate this collision of opinion among the Irish authorities. During the year 1694, no payments out of this grant were made to the ministers; and, early in the following year, the trustees, under the royal patent, petitioned King William that these arrears might be paid up, and the future payments rendered more punctual. When this petition was laid before the lords-justices, their party feelings were immediately displayed. Sir Cyril Wyche and Mr. Duncombe were of opinion that the grant should be withdrawn, and no further payments made to the ministers; hence, it is not improbable that the suspension of the grant had been owing to their underhand influence. But Lord Capel differed entirely from them, and wrote to the Duke of Shrewsbury, the secretary of state, in London, urgently recommending the continuance of the grant. This interference was successful, and, in April 1695, the trustees and other ministers wrote to Mr. Vernon, private secretary to the duke, thanking him for his "late contributing to obtain his majesty's gracious grant for the continuance of his royal bounty."<sup>1</sup> Such a marked difference of opinion as thus existed among the heads of the Irish government could not be permitted to continue long; and, as it was found necessary to summon a new parliament in 1695, a previous change in the administration became indispensable. Accordingly, in place of lords-justices, the government was committed to Lord Capel, as lord-deputy, in the month of May, and preparations were immediately made for a new election, and for convening the parliament in the course of the year.

Among the questions which were to come before this new parliament, that of extending legal protection to the Presbyterian Church was one. Though the attempt made in the preceding parliament had been defeated by the bishops and their supporters in the lords, unless it were accompanied by the exclusion of the Presbyterians from all public offices, the King and his advisers continued to be still in favour of a liberal toleration act for Ireland, free from such an unjust and impolitic exclusion. These views were warmly supported by the lord-deputy, and it was hoped that his influence, joined to the obvious justice and expediency of the measures in such a country as Ireland, would ensure its success. But these expectations were destined to be once more disappointed. The Irish party were now beginning to adopt more unreservedly the maxims, and to act upon the policy of the English Tories towards Dissenters. They were headed, not only by the bishops, but by the lord-chancellor of Ireland, Sir Charles Porter, and by Sir Richard Cox, then one of the justices of the court of common pleas. Accordingly, when the Irish privy-council were preparing such bills as the deputy recommended for the approbation of the English government, prior to their being submitted to the Irish Parliament, Lord Capel laid before them the draft of an act "for the ease of Protestant Dissenters,"<sup>2</sup> similar to the one which had been prepared under Lord Sydney three years before. So liberal a measure was immediately opposed by the same party who had defeated the previous bill. On this occasion, the opposition in the council was led by Sir Richard Cox, who, while he professed it to be his opinion that "all friends to the State should have a free toleration of their religion," repeated the usual sophism that "as there was no test in Ireland, it was necessary for the security of the Established Church to exclude from offices, or any share in the government, all those who would not conform to the Church established by law." He therefore moved that a clause should be added to the proposed bill, to exclude Presbyterians from all public offices, civil or military, and this motion was carried against the government by the majority of the council, to the great mortification of the lord-deputy.<sup>3</sup> This adverse vote, however, did not deter Lord Capel from proceeding with the measure, and bringing it before parliament so soon as it should meet.

While this bill was under the consideration of the council, the Presbyterians were not inactive. The leading members of their Church in Dublin urged the northern ministers and people to assist them in obtaining an act of toleration from the approaching parliament. Letters were written to the several presbyteries in Ulster, recommending them to unite in an application for that purpose to the King himself, then conducting in person the siege of Namur, in Flanders. The records of the Presbytery of Lagan, the only one whose minutes for this year are extant, will show the manner in which this application was generally received, and the arrangements made for carrying it out. That Presbytery, at their meeting at St. Johnston, on the 2nd of July, resolved unanimously—"That a commissioner be sent forthwith to Flanders, in order to supplicate the King for our legal liberty, and for his allowance to supplicate the government here for a redress of our particular grievances. And that this commission be chosen by the general committee in Belfast, from these three ministers, the Rev. Robert Campbell, minister of Ray, in Donegall, the Rev. William Adair, minister of Antrim, and the Rev. John M'Bride, minister of Belfast." They also recommended that the commissioner, when appointed, should proceed by way of Scotland, and "consult Mr. Secretary Johnson and the Rev. Mr. William Carstairs, and crave their assistance and advice in managing this affair." All these arrangements, it may be presumed, were duly carried into effect prior to the meeting of parliament.

At this crisis, the Presbyterians employed the press to plead the cause of toleration before their countrymen. The Rev. Mr. Boyse once more came forth as their advocate, and, early in the year 1695, he published a short statement of their claims, though without affixing his name, entitled—"The case of the Protestant Dissenters in Ireland, in reference to a Bill of Indulgence, represented and argued."<sup>4</sup> The following outline of this exceedingly rare tract, in the words of the author, will exhibit the reasonable demands of the Presbyterians, and the strong grounds on which he rested their case. He exhibits their views as embracing two objects. "First, they desire such a bill as may give them a full security for the free exercise of religion according to their consciences. For granting them such a bill the following reasons are humbly offered :—I. Such a bill is necessary for the common Protestant interest in this kingdom," that is, it was necessary for encouraging Protestants to settle in Ireland, thereby increasing their number, and for ensuring their union. "II. It is highly reasonable in itself, because—(1.) The early zeal of the Protestant Dissenters in defence of the constitution and of religion called for it. (2.) Foreign Protestants have the same

<sup>4</sup> This very rare tract, comprised in three pages folio, without a title page, is in Trinity College Library, Dublin. I am not aware of any other copy being now extant. It is not included in Boyse's collected works, published in 1728, probably because a copy could not even then be found.

liberty granted them by an act of the last parliament in Ireland. (3.) The Papists in this kingdom enjoy the liberty of their religion by virtue of a public treaty. (4.) Either the worship of Protestant Dissenters must be tolerated, or suppressed by the strict execution of penal laws. (5.) The Protestant Dissenters of Ireland are the only persons in the three kingdoms to whom one great end of his majesty's declaration is yet unaccomplished, viz., the making a law to cover all Protestants from persecution on account of religion. Second, they desire that there may be no such clauses annexed to this bill as would disable them from serving their king and their country. Many who are for a bill of liberty, yet think it needful to annex some such clauses to it as may incapacitate them for any civil and military offices, for which they allege the example of England, and think fit the same test to be imposed here. But that such a test here is highly inexpedient, will appear from these considerations. I. The Sacramental Test in England was chiefly designed against the Papists. II. Such a test is against the common Protestant interest of Ireland. There would be no greater wisdom in setting up such a test, than in needlessly cutting off one arm, when probably we shall have use for both to defend us. III. It does not seem agreeable to the judgment of the parliament of England that any such test should be imposed here, else they would have inserted it in their act repealing the oath of supremacy. IV. Such a Sacrament Test is as unreasonable as it is dangerous. For, (1.) If the Bill of Indulgence be clogged with this test, instead of being a favour to Protestant Dissenters, it will be rather a great hardship upon them, and put them into worse circumstances than they are in at present. (2.) The receiving the sacrament is no fit test of admission to civil and military offices. (3.) The Established Church will be no ways endangered, though the Bill of Indulgence should pass without any such severe clause to disable Protestant Dissenters from serving their country. The kingdom had been entirely lost if the Dissenters had not, at Enniskillen and Derry, concurred to preserve it."

This powerful and seasonable appeal did not long remain unnoticed. The first opponent it called forth was Dr. Tobias Pullen, grandson of the archbishop of Tuam, and formerly Fellow of Trinity College, Dublin. He had probably first come into contact with Presbyterians when resident at Ramelton, in Donegal, as rector of Tullyaughnish from 1677 to 1682, or perhaps a few years later. In 1694, he became bishop of Cloyne, and, in May, 1695, was translated to the see of Dromore, in the county of Down. He was thus once more brought into communication with the Ulster Presbyterians; and to this numerous party in his new diocese his reply to Mr. Boyse would not prove a favourable introduction. He did not, however, attach his name to it, but published anonymously, "An Answer to a Paper, entitled 'The case of the Protestant Dissenters of Ireland, in reference to a Bill of Indulgence, represented and argued.'"<sup>5</sup> In this pamphlet, Bishop Pullen takes very high ground. He admits, indeed, with apparent readiness, the propriety of granting a legal toleration to the Presbyterian Church, but he neutralises this admission by describing the proposed toleration as a favour which the Episcopalians were "inclined to grant, more out of compliance with the importunity of those that desire it, than any sense of its reasonableness, as parents humour their children, in giving them things that are pleasing to their palates, though prejudicial to their healths, only because they eagerly desire them." That in reality he was opposed to any act of toleration, is evident from the warmth and eagerness with which he endeavours to overthrow every argument of Mr. Boyse in its favour. He argues that toleration would only multiply sects, encourage the Romanists, and weaken the Protestant interest in Ireland. He represents the Presbyterians as, of all others, the least deserving of being tolerated, on account of the conduct of their brethren in Scotland, both at the period of the Covenant, and more recently at the Revolution. He insists that their services in Ireland had been amply compensated without the additional boon of a toleration. They have received, he says, "more than ordinary marks of royal favour, partly by the free liberty that is granted them throughout the kingdom for the public exercise of their religion, and for the building of meeting-houses even in corporate towns, [yet he objects to this liberty, by mere connivance, being secured by law,] as also by his majesty's bounty, in allowing yearly hitherto a considerable sum for the maintenance of their ministers." He rather insultingly assures them that "the experience they have had of the tenderness of Episcopalians towards them heretofore, ought to be a sufficient argument and security to them of future kindness," without the formality of a law. In a vein of sarcastic irony, which would have done honour to Dean Swift himself, he asserts that a Toleration Act was opposed by many Episcopalians, in order "that they may still have it in their power to show their tenderness to their Dissenting brethren; and may prevent or repress the misdemeanours that some Nonconformists may possibly be guilty of, if they had a legal toleration!" Not less singular is his vindication of using the Lord's Supper as a fitting test for civil offices, which he rests on the unimportance of the act of communion. "Why," he tauntingly asks, "should the State employ those that refuse to give so trivial and inconsiderable a mark of compliance with its orders?" Only let these stiff-necked Presbyterians conform to the Established Church by the paltry act of violating their conscientious convictions, and apostatising from their beloved national church, and then the State will employ them in keeping the peace, collecting the taxes, and fighting the battles of their country !

Scarcely had this pamphlet appeared, when another bishop took the field against the Presbyterians' claim for a legal toleration, as stated by Mr. Boyse. Dr. Anthony Dopping, the bishop of Meath, mentioned in the preceding chapter as presenting addresses, equally loyal and devoted, to King James and to King William, published a tract, but, like his brother prelate of Dromore, without affixing his name to it, entitled, "The Case of the Dissenters of Ireland considered in reference to the Sacramental Test."<sup>6</sup> This new opponent did not discuss the question of toleration, which he professed himself willing to concede. He applied himself principally to show that, if granted by parliament, it must be accompanied by a Sacramental Test excluding the Irish Dissenters from all public offices. On this topic he followed very nearly the course taken by Bishop Pullen, enlarging on the dangerous principles of the Presbyterians, as evinced in the Covenant, and showing the manifold dangers to which the Established Church would, as he thought, be certainly exposed, by their continuing to hold any post in the public service, however humble, after receiving the benefit of a legal toleration.

The appearance of these pamphlets, nearly at the same time, plainly indicated the organisation of a party prepared to defeat, in the approaching parliament, the liberal intentions of the King and his ministers towards the Presbyterians. It became, necessary, therefore, without loss of time, to refute the objections urged by these influential writers against the proposed toleration; and Mr. Boyse forthwith published another pamphlet, entitled, "The Case of the Protestant Dissenters of Ireland in reference to a Bill of Indulgence, vindicated from the exceptions alleged against it in a late Answer."<sup>7</sup>

Having already intimated the principal grounds on which each party rested their case, it is unnecessary to refer to the contents of this rejoinder. It is enough to say, that Mr. Boyse carefully and, as will now be generally admitted, convincingly replied to Bishop Pullen, and, in the latter part of his work, to Bishop Dopping, and that he placed the claims of the Irish Presbyterians to obtain a Toleration Act, free from the Sacramental Test, in the clearest light.

It was in the midst of this controversy that the Irish Parliament was opened by Lord Capel on the 27th of August, 1695. He lost no time in having the question of toleration brought under its notice. On Tuesday, the 24th of September, the Earl of Drogheda obtained leave from the House of Lords to bring in "heads of a bill for ease to Dissenters," which appears to have been the same as that which had been brought before the council, and its object defeated by the vote of the majority. But, on the day on which it was introduced, the former opponents of the measure were in full force to defeat it once more. Out of forty-three peers who were in attendance, there were no less than twenty-one of them bishops, including, of course, Bishop King, of Derry, with the two pamphleteers, Pullen and Dopping. The High Church party immediately showed their strength by carrying a resolution postponing the consideration of the bill till the following week.<sup>8</sup> The friends of the measure appear to have been disheartened by this vote, and to have deemed it vain to attempt to carry the measure in the face of such opposition. The subject was, therefore, allowed to drop in the lords. But, at the same time it was brought before the House of Commons under a different form. At the opening of each session of parliament, it was customary to appoint a committee to consider what English acts, not in force in Ireland, should be adopted here, and to report thereon from time to time to the house. Accordingly, on the same day on which the subject had been brought before the House of Lords, the committee of the commons reported that, in their opinion, the English Act of Toleration ought to be enacted, and made a law in Ireland, with such alterations as might be necessary to adapt it to the state of the kingdom. This was substantially the same proposal which was submitted to the lords. For the English Act of Toleration did not impose any civil disabilities on Dissenters. These had been created by the Sacramental Test Act, passed nearly twenty years previously. The effect, therefore, of extending the former act to Ireland, would have been to afford the Presbyterians all the legal protection which they desired, without subjecting them to the loss of any civil privileges already enjoyed by them. But the opponents of the measure proved to be as numerous and resolute in the commons as they had been in the lords. A debate arose on the question, which, by developing the relative strength of the two parties, appears to have convinced the government of the impossibility of obtaining such a liberal measure of toleration as they wished. They consented that the debate should be adjourned,<sup>9</sup> but it was not resumed on the day appointed; and the great party struggle on the impeachment of the lord-chancellor (Porter), which immediately followed, may probably have contributed to direct the attention of the commons from the subject. At all events, it was not discussed again during the remainder of the session, which was not closed till the month of December.

The great argument urged by the bishops and their adherents in both houses was, that the Established Church would not be safe if the Presbyterians were tolerated, without being stript of every office, civil and military. Yet the results of the last two parliaments might have convinced every unprejudiced person how groundless such a plea was. The Presbyterians, with their friends in the Establishment, were, as a party, so powerless in either house, that, even when supported by government influence, they were unable to carry a single point. How could a body so politically weak endanger the stability of the Established Church? Enjoying a free toleration, they would, on the contrary, have proved, as the result has shown, its friends and supporters in the time of real danger. The pretext, that it was necessary to exclude them from office for fear of their overturning the Establishment, could not, at all events, have been decently urged in the lords by their inflexible opponent, Bishop King. He, at least, was fully aware how very powerless they were, even when favoured by the crown. Writing to an English bishop about a year afterwards, he did not hesitate to say, "The Dissenters' interest in this kingdom is really in itself very weak and low, as sufficiently appeared in the last session of our parliament, in which all their interest joined the lord-deputy's, the speaker of the House of Commons,<sup>10</sup> and all his adherents, could not carry anything that we had not a mind to; and, indeed, there were hardly ten Dissenters in the house." In the same letter, he pitifully bewails the scanty measure of favour which the Irish government had extended to the Presbyterians, and represents it in the most invidious light. "It has been the business of most of our governors," he writes, "since the Revolution, to make an interest for Dissenters. My Lord Capel did it aboveboard, and professed that he had the King's commands so to do it, which intimation did them more service than all the other ways he could have invented; for every body here has a mighty deference to his majesty's pleasure." Yet the only instance he produces of the extraordinary favour shown to these undeserving Presbyterians is the following:—"To give an instance of my lord's bias that way, there needs no more but to look over the list of sheriffs made last year by him, and it will appear that if he could find a Dissenter in the whole county, the meanest contemptible fellow in it, he was sure to be named sheriff, though the great men of the county looked on it as an affront, and remonstrated from their quarter-sessions against it." Bishop King then represents the members of his own Church as so unstable and selfish, that unless these Dissenters were discouraged, the Episcopalians were ready to become Presbyterians the moment they saw that their worldly interests would be promoted by the change. "Now," he feelingly exclaims, "if we have such governors still put upon us, 'twill be impossible, whatever reason or Scripture be against schismatics, to hinder their multiplying; for most people value their interest above their religion. And if Dissenters be picked out for places of honour, trust, and profit, whilst their equals are passed by, many will daily qualify themselves as they see their neighbours do. I know not how things are in England with the Church, but I can assure your lordship this is the case here, and that it is a great disservice to his majesty in many respects."<sup>11</sup> It is easy to trace in these splenetic complaints the working of that jealousy of the Presbyterians, and that ill concealed hostility to their Church, which could be satisfied only by their expulsion from every "place of honour, trust, and profit," and by conferring on Episcopalians, attached merely by interest to their Church, a monopoly of the honours and emoluments of the public service.

Not long after the prorogation of parliament, the Presbyterians lost the steady supporter of their claims to toleration—the Lord-Deputy Capel. He died near Dublin in the end of May, 1696; and, in opposition to the wishes of the English administration, the government of Ireland, by an old act of parliament, devolved on their opponent, the lord-chancellor, Sir Charles Porter. Being too powerful to be altogether removed from office, the King, to counteract his influence, constituted him one of the three lords-justices who were appointed to govern Ireland, and associated with him the Earl of Montrath, a supporter of the English interest, and the Earl of Drogheda, who was said to be an adherent of the Irish, or the chancellor's party.<sup>12</sup> This arrangement was only of short duration. The sudden death of the lord-chancellor, in the month of December following, occasioned another commission to be issued to new lords-justices. The chief responsibility of this government rested on the Earl of Galway; for, of his two colleagues in office, Lord Villiers, afterwards Earl of Jersey, was absent on the Continent, employed in the negotiations which ended in the peace of Ryswick; and it was sometime before his other colleague, the Marquis of Winchester, afterwards Duke of Bolton, came over to Ireland, and when he did come, he exercised but little influence on the course of affairs.<sup>13</sup> The government of Ireland was, therefore, in reality conducted by Lord Galway during the next four years.

This nobleman was a native of France, of the illustrious family of Ruvigny, who had long been among the acknowledged heads of the French Protestants. At the revocation of the edict of Nantes, he had been compelled to fly to Holland, where he was hospitably received by William, then Prince of Orange. He accompanied the King in his expedition to England, and afterwards to Ireland, where he distinguished himself at the head of his countrymen in the battle of the Boyne,* and was rewarded with the post of lieutenant-general and the title of viscount, and afterwards Earl of Galway. He was devotedly attached to King William, and, from education and conviction, he was a warm friend to toleration, and disposed to favour the Presbyterians, who were so nearly allied in doctrine, government, and worship, to his mother-church in France. But he had little experience in political affairs, and scarcely any knowledge of the country he governed; and though sincerely desirous of discharging his high trust to the satisfaction of his king, and for the welfare of the people of Ireland, his administration was far from proving successful or popular.

[* It appears from the Memoir of Henri de Ruvigny, Earl of Galway, by the Rev. David C. A. Agnew, a minister of the Free Church of Scotland, and son of the late Sir Andrew Agnew, Bart., that Dr. Reid has been here led astray by the statements of preceding historians. The Ruvigny who was at the battle of the Boyne, was Pierre de Ruvigny, Lord de la Caillemotte, a younger brother of Henri de Ruvigny, Earl of Galway. Pierre was wounded in the battle, and the wound proved mortal. Mr. Agnew states that the Marquis took no part in the Irish campaign of 1690. See Memoir by Mr. Agnew, p. 38. Edinburgh, 1864.]

It was confidently expected that these new lords-justices would have assembled the parliament early in the year 1697. The Presbyterians were already bestirring themselves once more to obtain a Toleration Act. In the previous November a general committee of delegates from the several Presbyteries met at Belfast, in order to draw out an address to the King, praying for their "legal liberty." They agreed to despatch one of their number to England to present it in person to his majesty, and to draw his attention and that of his ministers, to the painful position in which they still stood in the eye of the law. At the same time, the prospect of a parliament roused the High Church party to renew their efforts for opposing the passage of a Toleration Act such as the Presbyterians desired. The controversy on this subject was accordingly resumed, and Bishop Pullen, after a long silence, published anonymously a defence of his former pamphlet in reply to Mr. Boyse's animadversions.<sup>14</sup> The bishop's tone had now grown much keener since the publication of his former tract; and he stooped to make use of several gossiping stories to the discredit of certain Presbyterian ministers, some of which stories were altogether unfounded, and others greatly exaggerated. On the ground of these calumnies, which, even at the worst, inculpated only individuals, and not the body at large, he endeavoured, in the usual strain, to show the danger of granting toleration to Presbyterians, without depriving them of their public offices. He again enlarged, with the greatest seriousness, on the excessive tenderness of the Established Church towards Nonconformists, because they had not long ago seized, imprisoned, or banished their ministers as intruders into the parishes of the national clergy. With equal gravity he proposes the following expedient for protecting the kingdom against the importation of Presbyterian principles from Scotland:—"Therefore, for the preservation of the public peace and safety of the nation, 'tis advisable that we should deal with their preachers at their first coming over, as 'tis usually done with those that come from a country infected with the plague. They should all be obliged to perform their quarantine, and undergo some religious tests and probations before they be publickly allowed to preach in their conventicles."<sup>15</sup>

Bishop Dopping, the other episcopal opponent of toleration, having died in the spring of this year, his place was supplied by a younger and more effective controversialist, who, by birth, education, and connexions, was a thorough Churchman. His father, and his father's brother, had both been prelates of the Irish Church; he himself made his way to a mitre, and died an archbishop, and both his sons also became bishops: such were the rare episcopal honours which fell to the lot of the favoured family of the Synges!*

The Rev. Edward Synge had

[* "The family of Synge, which gave five prelates to the Church in Ireland, was descended from one Millington, of Cheshire, whose fourth son, a canon in the Collegiate Church of St. Mary Magdalene, Bridgnorth, Salop, was distinguished by the excellence of his voice in the choir, and was generally known by the name of Sing, or Synge. been educated at Oxford, and at this time held several benefices in the dioceses of Cork and Cloyne. When the question of toleration had been discussed in 1695, he had prepared a tract upon the subject. But, as the failure of the proposed bill in parliament had suspended the controversy for a time, he refrained from sending it to the press. "But," as he states in his preface, "because it is not improbable but that our dissenting brethren will, now the parliament meets again, endeavour to gain the same point which before they aimed at, it is hoped these papers may at least be as seasonable now as they would have been had they been published at the time when they were written." On the eve of the opening of parliament his tract appeared, under the title of "A Peaceable and Friendly Address to the Nonconformists, written upon their desiring an Act of Toleration without the Sacramental Test."<sup>16</sup> Mr. Synge appears to have been an amiable man, moderate in his views, mild and courteous in his language, and disposed in general to favour the Nonconformists, if the phantom of the "Church in danger," which has misled so many excellent men, both before and since, had not deluded him into the adoption of the intolerant measure of excluding them from all public offices. The greater part of his pamphlet consists of an expostulation with the Presbyterians on the unreasonableness of their separation from the communion of the Established Church. He touches the real question at issue only very briefly in the conclusion; where, notwithstanding all his "peaceable and friendly" counsels, he decidedly opposes the granting of any toleration to them, except they be at the same time excluded from "all the places of trust, power, and profit in the commonwealth," an exclusion which he insists is absolutely necessary for protecting the Episcopal Church from being overthrown by them in Ireland, as their brethren had so recently done in Scotland.

<sup>16</sup> Dublin, 1697, 4to, pp. 10. The preface bears the date of July 15, 1697. It was reprinted in Dublin, in 1732—33, when an effort was made for the repeal of the Irish Sacramental Test Act; and a letter from the author, then archbishop of Tuam, was appended to it, declaring that his views were still unchanged, that the Presbyterians were rightly excluded from all public offices, and that they ought never to be permitted to hold any place of trust or emolument.

This renewal of opposition to their claims, in order to influence the parliament, could not well be overlooked by the Presbyterians. Their former advocate, Mr. Boyse, did not reappear in this controversy, but his place was not unworthily supplied by a minister in Ulster, the Rev. John M'Bride. He was a native of Ireland, and educated at the university of Glasgow, where he was enrolled in the year 1666. Some time after the year 1670, he was ordained by the Presbytery of Tyrone to the pastoral charge of the Presbyterians in the parish of Clare, near Trandragee, in the county of Armagh, among whom he officiated nearly twenty years. At the death of the Rev. Patrick Adair in the year 1694, Mr. M'Bride became his successor in the Presbyterian church of Belfast, still the only one in that town, and over this church he presided for another period of above twenty years. So soon as Bishop Pullen's last pamphlet had appeared, he had written a reply to it, but had resolved to lay it aside, until the publication of Mr. Synge's "Address" compelled him to send it to the press, together with an answer to the latter; and, in the autumn of this year, he published in one pamphlet "Animadversions" on both these pieces, without prefixing his name.<sup>17</sup> Mr. M'Bride is perhaps not so polished or vigorous a writer as <sup>17</sup> Its full title was as follows:—"Animadversions on 'The Defence of the Answer to a Paper entituled, 'The Case of the Dissenting Protestants of Ireland in reference to a Bill of Indulgence, from the exceptions made against it.' Together with an Answer to 'A Peaceable and Friendly Address to the Nonconformists, written upon their desiring an Act of Toleration without the Sacramental Test.'" Printed in the year 1697. 4to, pp. 118. This pamphlet was most probably printed in Belfast, as the art of printing had been introduced there the previous year, by Messrs James Blow and Patrick Neill, from Glasgow, at the invitation of the sovereign of the town, who joined in partnership with them. The place of printing was not given in the title-page of the above pamphlet, the printers being probably apprehensive that the ill-affected Church party might take steps to break up or injure their concern, if they had been known to print works reflecting on the Established Church.

Mr. Boyse, but he is quite as able and expert a disputant. He carefully reviewed the arguments and the allegations of both writers, refuting the one and exposing the gross inaccuracy of the other, especially of those calumnious reports to which the bishop had given too ready credence. The following passage from his prefatory address to the reader will afford a specimen of his style of writing, and exhibit the well-grounded confidence he had in the justice of his cause:—"The people we plead for are not the idle and consuming caterpillars of the nation, but industrious labourers, ingenious artists, and honest traders; whose religious principles will abide in their strength while one jot or tittle of the law of God endures, because they adore the fulness of the Holy Scriptures as the perfect and only rule of faith and manners. They believe the necessity of a standing Gospel ministry in the Church, to whose directive authority they submit themselves, not by an implicit faith, but by a judgment of discretion. All God's holy ordinances and instituted worship they embrace, but their fear towards God is not taught by the commandments of men. Their doctrine bears conformity with that of the Reformed Churches abroad, and harmoniously agrees with that of Ireland, declared in her convocation in the year 1615, excepting in what relates to prelacy and ceremonies. They are willing to give unto Cæsar what is Cæsar's, and unto God what is God's. They profess their Credenda, Petenda, and Agenda, ought all to be regulated by the Word of God. These principles we believe are able to abide a fiery trial. And as their principles are true, so their petitions are modest. Episcopal grandeur, jurisdiction, or revenues, are not demanded for their ministers or by them. A liberty to serve God according to these foresaid principles, with a relief from some penal laws formerly framed against them, and that no new ones be forged to their prejudice, is all they require. And if such modest requests may be with Christian conscience denied a people of such principles, we leave to the determination of our Judge, that standeth at the door, if men should give sentence against us." Any attempt to give an outline of this satisfactory defence of the character and claims of the Irish Presbyterians would be as uninteresting as it is unnecessary at the present time. It was too pointed and effective to remain unnoticed. Mr. Synge resumed the pen, and, in the end of the following year, he published a defence of his address in reply to Mr. M'Bride.<sup>18</sup> Without retracting in the least his opposition to the granting of any bill of indulgence to the Presbyterians, unless accompanied by their exclusion from all public offices, he expressed himself in this pamphlet in such unexceptionable terms on the abstract question of toleration, that I cannot refrain from laying before the reader the following passages:—"But since all that has been said and written in this controversy [respecting conformity to the Episcopal Church], does not convince them [the Presbyterians], I think it is very fit that they should be left to stand or fall to their own master, and that a full and free liberty should be granted them to serve God according to those principles which he [Mr. M'Bride] mentions, with a relief from all penal laws whatsoever, as long as they are ready to give the civil government the same assurance that other subjects do of their loyal and peaceable demeanour.—For to persecute or punish men that are peaceable and obedient to the civil government on account of their mistakes in matters of religion or the worship of God, is what I have never failed to declare against, wherever there was any occasion for it. And God is my witness, that I had not the least thought or design tending that way, when I writ or published my Address to the Nonconformists." This publication closed the discussion of the Presbyterians'

<sup>18</sup> It is entitled, "A Defence of the Peaceable and Friendly Address to the Nonconformists, against the Answer lately given to it. In which the obligation to conform to the constitutions of the Established Church is maintained and vindicated, the Answerer's objections solved, and his calumnies refuted." claims for toleration, which had been protracted through nearly three years, and which terminated at the very time when their grievances for want of such toleration began to be seriously felt. Alienation was now rapidly increasing between the Episcopals and them. The overwhelming influence of the one party, and the weakness of the other, had now been clearly ascertained; and the stronger party were not proof against the temptations to oppression which so often accompany the possession of power.

It was in the midst of this revived controversy that the Irish Parliament was opened by the lords-justices in the end of July, 1697, and it sat without interruption for four months. There is no trace, however, of any attempt having been made in either house to introduce the question of toleration. Yet, on one or two incidental points, the commons certainly displayed a liberal and tolerant spirit. Thus they proposed to continue for ten years longer, and with additional privileges, an act for naturalising foreign Protestants, principally Nonconformists, which had been re-enacted for a limited period in 1692.<sup>19</sup> This resolution they followed up by presenting an address to the lords-justices, praying that a foreign Protestant minister might be appointed, at a reasonable salary, in every parish where fifty families of such Protestant strangers might be settled.<sup>20</sup>

<sup>19</sup> By the Act 4 Will. & Mary, chap. 2. This Act, in section 3, secured to them "the free exercise of their religion, and liberty of meeting together publicly for the worship of God and of hearing divine service, and performing other religious duties in their own several rites used in their own countries."

<sup>20</sup> "Journals of Irish Commons," vol. ii., p. 919. In the State Paper Office there is a memorial from the French Protestants to the government, dated in January, 1696, from which it appears that the King had previously promised to grant salaries to their ministers. This resolution of the commons, therefore, was passed, as necessary for carrying out the royal promises in a constitutional manner. The above memorial is from "The French Churches, which observe the discipline of the Churches of France and Geneva," and gives the following list of their ministers and congregations in that year:—"Dublin, 2 ministers; Cork, 1; Waterford, 1; Caterlow [Carlow], 1; Portarlington, 1," all with endowments of £50 per annum. It is added that there was "a French colony established at Castleblayney about two years, upon promise of a minister being allowed them."

These measures were designed principally for the encouragement of French Presbyterians. During the sway of Cromwell, under whom Ireland enjoyed profound tranquillity, and was rapidly advancing in the arts of peace, a few families of French manufacturers and traders had settled in Dublin, and, for some years after the restoration of Charles II., had maintained among them a minister of their national Church. But the congregation decreasing, and becoming unable to support a minister, the Irish government offered to grant a salary to a French pastor, provided they would adopt a French version of the English liturgy in their worship, and conform in other respects to the Established Church. They accepted the offer in the year 1666, on the conditions proposed ; and at the same time St. Mary's Chapel, attached to St. Patrick's Cathedral, was appropriated to their use. On the revocation of the edict of Nantes, in 1682, a large accession of French refugees resorted to Dublin. But these new-comers, by reason probably of the persecution under which they had suffered so much, were too ardently attached to the principles and usages of their national Presbyterian Church to join with their countrymen previously settled there in the use of the English liturgy. They therefore formed themselves into a separate congregation, and a benevolent nobleman provided them with a suitable house for their worship; but the penalties for nonconformity were cruelly brought to bear upon these peaceable exiles, because they declined the use of the Common Prayer-book ; their Church was broken up, and their minister seized and imprisoned, nor could he obtain his liberty until he promised to abandon his countrymen and leave the kingdom.<sup>21</sup> At the Revolution they enjoyed, as a matter of course, full liberty of worship. When King William was in Dublin, after the battle of the Boyne, two French ministers, Messrs. Rossell and Abbadie, and four elders, applied to his majesty, on the 23d of July, for the grant of any popish chapel which might be forfeited to the crown for conducting their worship;<sup>22</sup> and, some time afterwards, the chapel which had been occupied by the Jesuits was appropriated to their use.<sup>23</sup> It was in favour of these nonconforming French Protestants that the act which guaranteed to them ample toleration had been passed by the Irish commons in 1692, and was now renewed in 1697—a boon which, while it was thus freely conceded to the French Presbyterians, was pertinaciously withheld from their Scottish brethren. Encouraged by these favours, it may be added, French nonconforming congregations sprang up, not only in the metropolis, but also in Carlow, Cork, Waterford, Portarlinton, Lisburn, and other places. It does not appear that the resolution of the commons to grant endowments to the ministers of these congregations was embodied in any act of parliament. It was, however, carried into effect, and salaries were paid to French Protestant ministers from this period downwards, so long as any French congregation existed in Ireland.<sup>24</sup>

The Irish commons took another step in this year, which indicated a desire on their part to extend some little additional protection to their Presbyterian fellow-countrymen. By Queen Elizabeth's act of uniformity, then still in force, all persons were required to attend their respective parish churches under certain penalties. In reviewing the several Irish acts against the Romanists, the commons, while they proposed no relaxation of that act with regard to them, adopted a resolution, that its penalties should not in future be enforced against those who should subscribe the declaration required in the room of the oath of supremacy.<sup>25</sup> This was one step in the right direction, though not a very important one, as the act of Elizabeth had now been obsolete in that respect. Had this resolution been incorporated into an act of parliament, it would have repealed one class of penalties under which the Presbyterians lay, and might have been followed by the abolition of the remaining ones. But it served only to indicate the temper of the House of Commons at this crisis. It was not even renewed during the session of 1698, the last meeting of parliament in this reign; so that, with the solitary exception of the English act for abrogating the oath of supremacy in Ireland, the legal disabilities of the Presbyterians continued to be the same at the close as they had been at the commencement of King William's reign.

<sup>23</sup> Perhaps this application may have been from the Conformist congregation using the English liturgy. But the French Nonconformists, in their "Apology," p. 16, referred to in a previous note, seem to say that it had proceeded from their friends, and that the Jesuits' chapel had been granted to them at the solicitation of Sir Charles Meredyth.

But while their political position in Ireland thus remained unchanged, the Presbyterians had been rapidly advancing in numbers and influence, and their Church had extended itself beyond its former limits. In the principal towns of Ulster, such as Londonderry, Belfast, Carrickfergus, and Coleraine, they had become members of the several corporations, and had attained to the highest municipal offices. New congregations sprang up in various directions; houses of worship were erected or enlarged; vacant congregations were gradually supplied with ministers, principally from the Established Church of Scotland; and efforts were made, principally by the erection of a philosophical seminary at Killileagh, under the care of the Rev. James M'Alpine, to afford facilities for young men to prepare for the ministry in their native land. New vacancies were created every year by the death of one or other of the eminent fathers of the Church, who had assisted in her reconstruction after the rebellion of 1641, and had presided over her councils during the dreary reigns of the restored Stuarts. In the year 1694, the Rev. Patrick Adair, of Belfast, was removed from the scene of his labours, and, in the following year, the venerable Thomas Hall, of Larne. In 1697 died the Rev. Anthony Kennedy, of Templepatrick, and the Rev. Henry Livingston, of Drumbo,* a relative of the celebrated John Livingston, of Killinchy, and, soon after, the Rev. Robert Cunningham, of Broadisland, near Carrickfergus, with the Rev. William Crooks, of Ballykelly, and the Rev. Thomas Boyd, of Aghadoey, both of whom had endured the horrors of the siege of Derry; these aged ministers, all ordained prior to the year 1641, were now called away to receive the reward of their "faith and patience." But their places were supplied by active and diligent successors, who were indefatigable in watering the vine which those faithful men had planted in Ulster, and which the storms of persecution had only caused to strike its roots more deeply into the soil, and spread its boughs more widely over the land.

As the Church extended itself, new arrangements in its external government became necessary. To secure a more efficient oversight, the five original presbyteries were now, in the year 1697, distributed into two particular synods, or sub-synods, as they were sometimes called, which were appointed to meet at Coleraine and Dromore in the months of March and October of each year. At the same time, the Presbytery of Antrim having become too large, in consequence of the rapid extension of the Church in that district, was divided into two, and the new presbytery was called the Presbytery of Belfast, that town being the ordinary place of its meeting. This arrangement of six presbyteries, two sub-synods, and one general synod, continued throughout the remainder of King William's reign ; but the continued extension of the Church rendered it necessary to enlarge this platform of government in the first year of the following reign.

[* Mr. Livingston died, April 7th, 1697, aged 66 years. His son, who was also the Rev. Henry Livingston, was minister of Ballynahinch, where he was ordained in 1704. His nephew, Mr. Wm. Livingston, of Lisburn, had a daughter, Anne, married to Mr. David White, of Ballymaglave. Their daughter, Rebecca White, was married to John Barnett, of Ballynaherty, near Saintfield, father of the late John Barnett, Esq., of Belfast, and grandfather of the Rev. John Barnett, D. D., Presbyterian minister, Moneymore.

This steady progress of the Presbyterian Church was not viewed with indifference by the narrow-minded portion of the clergy of the Establishment. In several parts of Ulster they began, on various pretexts, to annoy and harass the Presbyterian laity, as well as the ministers. It is from this year, 1697, when it was seen how powerless the Presbyterians were in parliament, and how remote was the prospect of their obtaining legal protection, that presbyteries and synods had reason to complain of new grievances.<sup>26</sup> Thus, in some places, they would not be permitted to bury their dead as formerly, unless the Episcopalian clergyman should officiate at the funeral, by reading the burial service of the liturgy—a test of conformity which the Presbyterians declined to adopt. In other places they were compelled to serve as church-wardens, and take certain official oaths contrary to their conscientious convictions—a grievance which was not rendered more tolerable, by observing that the Romanists were, for the most part, exempted from it. They were also prohibited in certain places from having schoolmasters of their own communion to instruct their families, all teachers being required to conform to the Established Church. And efforts now began to be made, for the first time, to deter the ministers from celebrating marriages among their own people, although they had invariably done so, after due proclamation of banns, since their first settlement in the kingdom.

The same jealous interference with the civil rights of the Presbyterians now began to be manifested in various places. As might be expected, from the hostile influence of Bishop King, the city of Derry had its full share of these sectarian jealousies and bickerings. Encouraged by him, one Thomas Moncrieff, an alderman, in the end of this year, laid a formal complaint before the lord-chancellor, to the effect, that the Presbyterian members of the corporation, being the majority, appointed none to municipal offices but members of their own Church; in particular, he alleged that he himself had been once passed over in the election of mayor, for no other reason than his being an Episcopalian, and referring for the truth of these allegations to Bishop King. The corporation vindicated themselves triumphantly from these unfounded charges, and traced them to their true source—the ill-will of the bishop. But, owing to his predominant influence in the castle, their elections of mayors and sheriffs, when they happened to fall on Presbyterians, were frequently set aside by the Irish government, and were made a pretext for soon after giving the Episcopalians a monopoly of all the corporate offices throughout Ireland.<sup>27</sup>

In proportion as the more bigoted of the Episcopalian clergy harassed the Presbyterians in these and other respects, the latter, as was to be expected, became less and less forbearing towards the former. Attempts at oppression on the one side not unfrequently led to rude incivilities, and perhaps insults on the other, and very unpleasant collisions in some places were often the result. From a fragment, which has been preserved, of a letter of Bishop King, of Derry, such an unseemly state of matters appears to have existed at Belfast, though, in all probability, the statement, as it affects the Presbyterians, is greatly exaggerated, proceeding, as it does, from one who was not very scrupulous or exact in his charges against them. In the year 1695, Dr. Edward Walkington, formerly a fellow of Trinity College, Dublin, and at that time holding a benefice in Ulster, was elevated to the see of Down and Connor. Lord Capel, then lord-deputy, had used his best efforts to procure a liberally-minded clergyman for these dioceses, and recommended Dr. Walkington as such a person to the English government. He describes him as "a very excellent and constant preacher, of a sober and a good life, and a man of great moderation and temper, which will render him the more agreeable to the Dissenters in the north. where his residence has been for some years past."<sup>28</sup> Lord Capel, however, must have been sadly deceived with regard to the tolerant character of this clergyman; for his sermon, preached in Dublin at the consecration of a bishop, only two years previously, might have shown "what spirit he was of," and how very ill-fitted he was for being "agreeable to the Dissenters of Ulster."<sup>29</sup> Early in the year 1698, he appears to have consulted Bishop King, of Derry, on some points of ecclesiastical law. The

<sup>29</sup> I refer to "A Sermon preached in Christ's Church, Dublin, at the consecration of John, bishop of Ossory. By Edward Walkington, D.D., archdeacon of that diocese," Dub., 1693, 4to. It is on "Neglecting to hear the Church;" an ominous text for all Dissenters in the mouth of a Churchman, and this sermon does not falsify the omen as the following extracts will show. After upbraiding Presbyterians for setting up altar against altar, he gives utterance to this offensive insinuation:—"I am tempted to believe that there is something more than religion and conscience at the bottom of these matters, that lawn-sleeves, and caps, and surplices, are too mean a quarry for these men to fly at, and that crowns and sceptres, I mean monarchy in general, is the true and real grievance;" (p. 15.) Referring to Presbyterianism, he says, "This holy discipline was born and bred in popular tumult, and I believe it will be hard to show that ever it got footing anywhere by any other means;" (p. 16.) Finally, he does not omit to add the usual High Church dogma, that those only have any claim to God's covenanted mercy who receive holy ordinances from the hands of Episcopalian ministers! (p. 21.) Had this sermon been brought in due time under the notice of Lord Capel, it is certain he never would have recommended its author to the see of Down and Connor, and thereby much irritation and mischief would have been prevented.

bishop, writing in reply from Dublin in the month of May, takes occasion to say—"I understand that the people of Belfast are very refractory, and do many irregular things; that they will not consent to enlarge their church lest there should be room for all the people; that they bury in spite of the [law] in the Church without prayers, and come in with their hats on; that they break the seats, and refuse to deliver their collection for briefs, according to the order of council, to the churchwardens. I think it is advisable," adds this rigorous bishop, who appears to have had informers against the Presbyterians in all parts of the province, "to observe [notice] as many of these passages [occurrences] as you can; put them into affidavits duly sworn, and send them up here to me or Sir John Coghill, and we will see what may be done for you. Tu ne cede malis, &c., is a good rule."<sup>30</sup>

How far Bishop Walkington acted on these suggestions, so full of hostility to the Presbyterians of Belfast, does not appear, though the following occurrence shows that he was no reluctant disciple of such a master. In the month of September following, he forwarded to the government a petition, containing several complaints against the Presbyterians of his diocese. It was sent, not as might have been expected, in the usual course, to the lords-justices of Ireland, these noblemen being probably suspected of not proving thorough enough tools of the hierarchy; it was transmitted to the lords-justices of England, at the head of whom was the archbishop of Canterbury, then administering the government in the absence of the King in Holland, who were doubtless expected to lend a more willing ear than their Irish colleagues in office to complaints against Dissenters. They contented themselves, however, with simply referring the petition to the heads of the Irish government, with instructions to inquire into the allegations contained in it. The following extract from this petition, which has never been printed, will exhibit the spirit of jealous hostility now actuating some of the dignitaries of the Establishment, and the length to which these zealots were prepared to go, in order to oppress the Presbyterians. Bishop Walkington says, in his petition—"There is great dissatisfaction given at the unreasonable liberty taken by the dissenting ministers and their elders in these parts, viz., in the north of Ireland, under colour of that connivance which they have from the government for the free and undisturbed exercise of their religion. For they are not content to assemble themselves in their several meeting-houses to worship God in their own way, but they proceed to exercise jurisdiction openly, and with a high hand over those of their own persuasion. They generally everywhere celebrate the office of matrimony, by which means the settlements made upon such marriages, and the titles of children to their inheritances, who are born of persons who are so joined together, are rendered disputable at law.<sup>31</sup> They celebrate the sacrament of the Lord's Supper in congregations so formidably numerous, by gathering the inhabitants of ten or twelve or more parishes together to one place, when they preach in the fields, and continue there a great part of the day together. They openly hold their sessions and provincial synods for regulating of all matters of ecclesiastical concern, and have set up at Killileagh a philosophical school, in open violation and contempt of the laws: By which bold and unreasonable attempts, and the probable consequences of them, if not prevented by your lordships' wisdom and care, your petitioner and his clergy will be extremely discouraged in their endeavours to reclaim the erroneous, and reduce several well-meaning persons to a right and sober judgment concerning the worship and discipline of the Established

<sup>31</sup> The bishop does not venture to say that Presbyterian marriages were invalid. He knew well that the best lawyers were of opinion that they were perfectly valid; but as the question had not been tried, he was safe in hazarding this very qualified assertion, that they were "disputable at law."

Church. For all arguments drawn from the necessity of obedience and submission to human laws will be of no force with those that are made to believe that the liberty that they assume, being hitherto without check, is not only from the connivance but approbation of the government. Your petitioner, therefore, humbly prays, that your excellencies would be pleased to undeceive these forward men, by putting such a stop to the liberties that they assume, as your lordships think most convenient for the good of the kingdom, and the safety and honour of the established religion: And that, whatsoever measures your excellencies would have to be taken by your petitioner for asserting the Church's right, and reforming these abuses, your excellencies would be pleased to signify it to my lords the bishops that are of the council, to be by them communicated to the petitioner."<sup>32</sup>

After this petition had been despatched to England, a circumstance occurred, which was eagerly seized on by the same party as another grave offence against the authority and jurisdiction of the Established Church. The Rev. Mr. M'Bride, of Belfast, having been the moderator of the previous synod, had, agreeably to the usual practice, opened the annual meeting of the synod in 1698 with a sermon. He chose for his subject the apostolic synod at Jerusalem. In the conclusion of this discourse, he took occasion to assert the right of the Church to hold similar assemblies of her office-bearers, and to show that the validity of such meetings did not depend on the sanction of the civil power. As his sentiments on this topic were not only complained of, now when they first appeared, but were afterwards appealed to by the Irish House of Lords as one of the grounds on which they then called for additional restrictions on Presbyterians, it becomes necessary to quote the following short paragraph, containing all that the preacher advanced on this subject, that the reader may see what was then deemed a serious ground of complaint:—"From the pattern of this assembly at Jerusalem, we are informed that the want of a call or commission to assemble from secular power (we being permitted to meet), doth not make our meeting unlawful before God, as some may fancy; nor doth the want of a civil sanction to our acts make them void; for this assembly had neither, yet was blessed of the Lord. The civil magistrate, we confess, may and ought to call ministers to their work, and protect them in it; yet this is necessary only to the well-being, but not to the being of such meetings. The primitive church, for the first three hundred years, enjoyed no such privilege more than we, yet wanted not their assemblies, nor dare we condemn them as unlawful. And as we have reason to bless God that we are permitted to meet in peace, though not commanded so to do, let us, as we have hitherto endeavoured, so behave ourselves as to give no just ground of offence; for sure we can do nothing prejudicial to the civil interest, if we keep within our own sphere, and pursue the just ends of our meeting, which are the preservation of truth and peace, and promoting holiness among ourselves, and those over whom the Lord hath set us; for certainly such will be found to be best subjects who conscientiously mind these duties."

This sermon was heard at the Synod with much acceptance, and the manuscript, having been obtained from Mr. M'Bride, was printed and published without his concurrence. Prefixed to it was the following title, which it is necessary to give in full, because it formed in itself a special ground of complaint against its author. It was entitled—"A Sermon before the Provincial Synod at Antrim, preached June 1, 1698. By Mr. John M'Bride, minister of Belfast. Published at the desire of some persons then present."<sup>33</sup>

So soon as this publication appeared, Bishop Walkington immediately added it to his list of Episcopalian grievances. He forwarded a copy, with a formal complaint against it, to the Irish lords-justices, who had already received his petition from the English government. In the beginning of October, Mr. M'Bride was summoned to Dublin, and the bishop was invited to substantiate his charges. Bishops King, of Derry, and Pullen, of Dromore, with other persons of note hostile to the Presbyterians, pressed the lords-justices, whose impartiality they dreaded, to refer the investigation of these matters to the privy-council, where the influence of the bishops was paramount. But they declined adopting this interested suggestion, on the ground that the petition had been referred to them expressly by the English authorities. They therefore retained the investigation in their own hands, calling in the assistance of certain of the judges, and several bishops. On Monday, the 10th of October, they held a court for this purpose in the castle, at which were present the Lord-Chancellor Methuen, Sir Richard Pyne, chief-justice of the court of king's bench, Chief-Baron Doyne of the exchequer, the archbishop of Dublin, and no fewer than five other bishops, among whom, of course, was the complainant, Bishop Walkington; the Rev. Mr. M'Bride, and the Rev. Mr. Boyse, who appears to have been another object of episcopal ire, were also present. The following account of the proceedings on this occasion has been preserved:—"Mr. M'Bride was first interrogated about his sermon then produced, who confessed the preaching, but not the printing thereof, whereof he convinced them. There was only one sentence in it condemned, viz.—'That 'tis lawful for the ministers to assemble in synods without the command of the magistrate (if permitted), &c.' He desiring the parenthesis to be read, the objection was answered, and nothing said to the contrary, or to any other part of the sermon by any of the six bishops who had full power and liberty to except against it.—The rest of the complaints were answered, so that both Mr. M'Bride and Mr. Boyse were dismissed without a censure; only 'twas required that they should recommend peace to their brethren and people, and that they should behave themselves respectfully towards the established clergy, which ever has been our practice before and since."<sup>34</sup> A contemporary letter, still extant, though never before published, furnished the following additional particulars:—"Mr. M'Bride was demanded if the sermon was preached by him, the chancellor showing it to him. He owned it was. He was asked, whether it was printed by his order? To which he answered, No. He was accused for the title-page its calling him 'minister of Belfast,' and their meeting 'a provincial synod.' He replied that the title-page was not his, but theirs who printed the sermon. Then, as to the matter of the petition, being questioned about the school at Killileagh, and that divinity was taught in it, he told them no divinity was taught there. And as to the philosophy school there, it was no more than what was done in the reign of Charles the Second, in whose time there were two such schools;<sup>35</sup> and he added that Mr. M'Alpine had a license for his school. The Bishop of Down and Connor asked, from whom? He replied from Mr. M'Neill, chancellor to the diocese. Mr. M'Bride was dismissed with an advice to him and

[The following agreement was entered into by three gentlemen connected with Killileagh, for the encouragement of Mr. M'Alpine:—"We, Captain Gawen Hamilton, William Hamilton, and Captain Hans Stevenson, within the county of Down, out of our good liking for learning, and for the encouragement of the same in this place, and particularly for encouraging the philosophical school now taught at Killileagh by Mr. John M'Alpin, Professor of Philosophy, and in consideration that he is in the future to keep and teach the said school at the town of Killileagh, do hereby oblige ourselves to provide him and his family a convenient dwelling house, rent free, and four souns grazing, together with meadow for hay to winter the aforesaid souns; as also our assistance for bringing home two hundred loads of turf, for firing to his family yearly:

his brethren to carry rectably towards the Established Church, and to them [the bishops in Ulster] to carry moderately.”<sup>36</sup>

Such was the issue of Bishop Walkington’s querulous petition against the Presbyterian ministers of Ulster. It must have been mortifying, both to himself and his episcopal brethren, to find that, after all their efforts, no restraints were laid on the free exercise of discipline and government in the Presbyterian Church. The lords-justices proved themselves to be impartial and independent men. They appear to have been sincerely desirous of preserving peace between the two Protestant Churches, ready to defend the Established Church from every improper interference with its rights and immunities, but, at the same time, prepared to protect the Presbyterians in the enjoyment of every reasonable privilege they could claim.

They had scarcely disposed of this case, when their attention was called to another collision between the two parties, which unexpectedly occurred in so very remote a locality as the town of Galway. It appears that some Presbyterian families from Ulster, having recently settled there, and being joined by some of the military in the garrison of similar principles, had invited the Rev. William Biggar, then minister of the Presbyterian Church in Limerick, to preach occasionally, and administer ordinances among them. Mr. Biggar’s visit proving unpalatable to the Episcopalians there, the dormant penalties of the law against nonconformity were forthwith brought to bear provided, always, that he continue his teaching philosophy in this place, upon the above said encouragement, it being performed unto him. In testimony whereof we hereto put our hands and seals this 4th day of May, 1697.

upon him. He was apprehended, carried before the mayor, and committed to prison. But the archbishop of Tuam,<sup>37</sup> Dr. John Vesey, a native of Coleraine, in Ulster, hearing of the affair, wrote to the mayor on the inexpediency of such a summary procedure, and Mr. Biggar was immediately liberated, and permitted to return to his charge at Limerick. The case was then brought before the lords-justices, by a memorial from the mayor and corporation of Galway, praying that, as there had not been any meeting of Dissenters there for the last twenty years, the Presbyterians should be prohibited from creating a division among the Protestants, to weaken their interest in the midst of so many Romanists. At the same time, the Presbyterian ministers of Dublin laid a complaint before the government of the harsh treatment which their brother, Mr Biggar, had received from the civic authorities of that town. The lords-justices sent for Mr. Biggar, and having examined him on the subject, found that he had confined himself strictly to the preaching of the Gospel, and that he had not given any unnecessary offence to the Episcopalians. They sent him back to Limerick, and directed that for the present no Presbyterian minister should preach in Galway. They immediately laid the whole case before the English government, to be submitted to the King, and prayed that his majesty's pleasure might be conveyed to them for their future guidance in the matter.<sup>38</sup> What directions were returned to them cannot now be ascertained. But it is probable that the prohibition against preaching in Galway was removed by order of the King; for, not more than two years after this period, there was not only a Presbyterian congregation regularly organised there, but a minister duly ordained to that charge.

tration of these lords-justices continued to be characterised by the same integrity and impartiality. The Presbyterians, therefore, felt encouraged to bring before them such grievances as from time to time were imposed upon them ; one of the most annoying of which arose out of the prosecutions which the High Church clergy in several places had now begun to institute against them in the prerogative courts on account of their marriages. The ministers were libelled for continuing to celebrate the marriages of their own people according to the forms of their National Church in Scotland, and heavy penalties were imposed upon them. The parties married were libelled as guilty of fornication, and condemned either publicly to confess themselves guilty of this crime in their respective parish churches, or compound for this penance by a heavy fine to the officer of the bishop's court, while all who refused to submit to these degrading alternatives were pronounced to be living in fornication, their marriages declared void, and their children as illegitimate. No attempt, however, was made by the clergy who instigated these prosecutions to have the alleged invalidity of these marriages tried in the civil courts, for the very obvious reason that, as the law was then understood, they were held to be perfectly valid and legitimate contracts, though irregularly entered into, and exposing the parties to ecclesiastical penalties.

The Synod met at Antrim in 1699, took into consideration this growing grievance ; and having occasion to thank one of the lords-justices, the Marquis of Winchester, recently created Duke of Bolton, for services rendered to the Church during a recent visit to England,<sup>39</sup> they resolved that their deputation should, at the same time, apply to their excellencies "for continuing their liberty, and exemption from molestation on account of marrying." The result of this application to the lords-justices does not appear; but the grievance in question was not abated, owing, probably, to the short period which they continued to preside over the government of Ireland. The Tory party were now rapidly regaining the ascendancy in England, and the King was compelled to yield to the pressure, and dismiss his favourite ministers.

It was some time before this change was felt in Ireland. In the summer of 1700, the Earl of Rochester, a decided Tory and High Churchman, was selected by the ministry and the King for the Irish government,<sup>40</sup> and at the close of the year he was formally appointed lord-lieutenant, though he did not visit Ireland till the autumn of the following year. The former lords-justices continued in office till April, 1701, when they were recalled, and the archbishop of Dublin, and the Earls of Drogheda and Mount-Alexander, were appointed in their room till the new lord-lieutenant should arrive. This change of government portended no good to the Presbyterians, but they resolved not to be wanting in their duty to "the powers that be," and to continue their efforts for obtaining legal protection and security. At a meeting of the general committee of the synod, held at Belfast in the beginning of September, they resolved, through their brethren in Dublin, to present a congratulatory address to the lord-lieutenant on his arrival in Ireland, which occurred a few days afterwards. On the 20th of that month, their deputation, consisting of the Rev. Francis Iredell, and the Rev. Alexander Sinclair, ministers in Dublin, were introduced by the Earl of Drogheda to his excellency, and presented the address "in the name of the Presbyterian ministers and people in the north of Ireland." In it they express their hope that, under his rule, they would continue to enjoy "that indulgent favour and protection which his most gracious majesty and his royal consort, of ever-blessed memory, were pleased to grant to them, and which hath been hitherto allowed." Fully aware that their position had now become critical, and that their opponents would eagerly embrace this conjuncture to injure them in the estimation of the government, they proceed to say :—" And seeing none are more bound to zealous loyalty by principles of conscience and gratitude than we, whereof we have given convincing evidences, we firmly resolve, in our several capacities and stations, not only to maintain the safety and honour of his sacred majesty's person and government, but also cheerfully to pay all the respect due to your excellency's great character ; hoping that the prudent moderation of your government will increase and confirm the high and good opinion we now have of you, and shall oblige us to satisfy your excellency that the favours we receive are not abused. And if the contrary be suggested, we humbly presume that your native candour and justice will persuade you to hear us before you entertain any other thoughts of us than that we are his majesty's sincerely loyal subjects, and under your excellency's direction and command." The reply of the lord-lieutenant to this address was more than usually brief ; it was to this effect :—" I thank you gentlemen. I shall be careful to discharge my duty to his majesty in the high station he has set me in ; and I hope I shall not give you any occasion to alter your favourable opinion of me."<sup>41</sup>

<sup>41</sup> The above address to the lord-lieutenant is preserved among the Wodrow MSS. in the Advocates' Library ; (Rob. iii., 3-5, 4to, MSS., vol. 28,) together with the following interesting letter from Mr. Iredell to the Rev. Mr. M'Bride, of Belfast, written immediately after their interview with his excellency :—" Rev. and dear brother,—Yesterday morning I was with the chancellor [Methuen] who is not well ; he approves of our addressing the lord-lieutenant. When he was in England, he says, by order from the King, he waited often upon the lord-lieutenant to inform him of the state of the kingdom, when he endeavoured to possess him how much it was for the peace of the kingdom that Protestant Dissenters, if peaceable, be defended from insults. The chancellor says he cannot find but that the lord-lieutenant has the same prudent affection for Dissenters that other governors have had. The chancellor seems still to be a friend, and promises good things, but says we had need to carry warily. Lord Drogheda took your letter in very good part, and ordered me to return you thanks. He said your address was very well. He found fault with nothing in it, tho' he did with that of the ministers here, and made them amend it. And this day Mr. Sinclair and I were introduced by him to the lord-lieutenant between ten and eleven of the clock, who ordered his secretary to read it publicly. His answer was to this purpose [as given above]. This in haste from your affectionate brother, &c."

THE general committee of the synod, which drew up the foregoing address to the lord-lieutenant, had been assembled at Belfast to take into consideration, among other matters, the increasing troubles to which the Presbyterian body were now subjected, on account of their continuing to celebrate marriages. They drew up a number of resolutions for the guidance of the Church at this conjuncture, which they forwarded to the different presbyteries for their opinion. Among these were the following recommendations:—"That all ministers continue as formerly to marry such as call them thereunto, the purpose of marriage being thrice published beforehand.—That in case any ministers be cited to the official court, they appear by their proctor, and demand a copy of their libel.—That some counsellor, learned in the law, be consulted whether our assisting at our people's marriages be contrary to law, and what is the most proper method for us to defend ourselves."<sup>1</sup> These resolutions indicate the difficulties with which they were now beset on this point. At a subsequent meeting, it was resolved to bring the whole subject before the notice of the new lord-lieutenant, and entreat the interposition of the government to stop these harsh proceedings. They embodied their case in a memorial, which was laid before his excellency in the beginning of October, and which, as it has never been printed, and supplies important information, to which the recent discussions on the same subject impart additional interest, may be inserted in full.<sup>2</sup> It commences thus:—

"That whereas his sacred majesty and royal consort, of ever-blessed memory, from their princely clemency and pious affection to their peaceable and loyal subjects, were pleased to grant your petitioners full assurance of their protection in the free exercise of our religion, which has not only been repeated since by his majesty, but faithfully performed and continued by all in chief authority under him in this kingdom, your excellency also being pleased of late to strengthen our hopes of its continuance. And, tho' we are not conscious to ourselves of forfeiting the favour allowed us, we are surprised to find some officials in this part of the kingdom endeavouring to deprive us of what we have so long peaceably enjoyed ; as appears by their pursuing both ministers and people in their courts for their nonconformity to the rules and ceremonies of the Church—ministers for solemnising marriage clandestinely as they please to call it, and making void such marriages by obliging persons so married publickly to confess themselves guilty of the damnable sin of fornication, to the no small grief of your petitioners who are hereby made infamous, their children incapable of succeeding to their effects and of divers other privileges, as being bastards : All which we are persuaded is done without the knowledge or consent of the government. Wherefore we, being necessitated to fly for refuge to your excellency, humbly beg your patient consideration of these few things.

<sup>2</sup> Taken from the Wodrow MSS. in the Advocates' Library: Jac. v., 1, 27, folio, vol. ii., No. 48, p. 63. No date is given, nor does the name of the Lord Lieutenant appear in the document; but there can be no doubt it was presented at this time to the Earl of Rochester. The discussions on this subject, which issued in the Irish Marriage Act of 1844, have induced me to preserve this early testimony of our fathers to these facts—that they had celebrated marriage from their first settlement in Ireland, and that the validity of these marriages had never been questioned in the civil courts.

“ 1. Your petitioners having been a considerable body of Protestant subjects in this kingdom now about eighty years, who, tho' dissenting from the Established Church in some things, yet in all revolutions continued loyal and peaceable, suffering for our loyalty in the time of usurpation to that degree that King Charles II. observed it, protected your petitioners, and gave the ministers a royal pension : And we cannot think our late active zeal for the preservation of this kingdom can be forgotten by those who found our assistance so heartily granted and useful. 2. As the Established Church doth, so we profess marriage to be a holy ordinance of God, and an honourable state by Christians religiously and publickly to be entered into, with pious exhortation and prayer suitable to the occasion by a minister of the Word. Wherefore it hath been and is our ordinary practice, and through God's assistance our resolution so to do when thereto called ; not being free in conscience to conform to what the service-book requires in this matter, whereof we are willing and ready to give our reasons when required. 3. As no minister of our profession hath till now of late ever been troubled on such account, so the civil magistrate hath never made void such marriage, or denied to your petitioners the privileges proper to lawful marriage. 4. All official courts have hitherto granted administrations, probate of wills, &c., to the widows and children of such marriages, as they did to others in the like case : the parish minister also constantly receiving his accustomed dues, as if they were married by himself ; whereby we believe they have judged such marriages lawful, else we do not understand how they could demand so much money as they have received for many years from your petitioners.

“ Wherefore may it please your excellency to consider how grievous it may be to a great part of his majesty’s subjects, if all marriages not solemnised according to the rules of the Established Church should be declared void, and their children thereby bastardised ; seeing hereby not only Presbyterians, Papists, and Quakers, must be great sufferers, but also many of the conforming clergy and laity descended from parents so married, of whom we are well assured there be several in this kingdom. Nor can it escape your wise consideration how unseasonable at this time it is to move such debates, which cannot but create animosities and disunite the affections of Protestants, when not only the consciences of some but the reputation and civil interest of many must be deeply engaged. We hope therefore God will direct your excellency to put a speedy stop to such proceedings as are not only a present grievance, but may prove of evil consequence to our posterity.”

The lord-lieutenant appears to have been so embarrassed by the proceedings against the Presbyterians, as detailed in this petition, that he immediately wrote to London for instructions how to act, and stated his determination to observe, in the meantime, the utmost prudence and caution. Mr. Vernon, the secretary of state, was unable, in the absence of the King in Holland, to furnish him with the necessary directions. He consulted the archbishop of Canterbury on the subject, but he, too, was unprepared to give an opinion, viewing it "as a matter of weight that may have great consequence either way." Mr. Vernon also called to his aid the bishop of Clogher, then in London; and, as was to be expected, he appears to have defended the proceedings against the Presbyterian marriages, assuring the secretary of his having heard, from one of the primate's officials, that the prosecutions in the bishops' courts had produced "this good effect already, that some of the Presbyterian ministers had appeared, and submitted themselves to the jurisdiction of these courts; and having promised they would forbear for the future this practice of marrying, they were discharged." Mr. Vernon not only distrusted this piece of news, but lamented these harsh proceedings against the Presbyterians. "I cannot but think it very unfortunate," he writes to the lord-lieutenant, "if in our present circumstances, people of any profession should come to extremities one with another. I am very confident his majesty will approve of your excellency's resolution to proceed in this matter with great caution. When he comes to England I shall desire to know his pleasure as to what he would have signified to your excellency about it."<sup>3</sup> When the subject was brought under the notice of King William, his majesty, as was to be expected, disapproved of the proceedings against the Presbyterians and expressed a wish that some expedient might be found for putting a stop to these prosecutions, without interfering with the rights of the Established Church.<sup>4</sup> Whether the lord-lieutenant made any effort to comply with the wish of the King does not appear.<sup>5</sup> He soon afterwards returned to England, entrusting the government to the same lords-justices that had been employed before his arrival, with the addition of two others, who were sworn into office in the end of the year 1701, and who, with an archbishop at their head, were not likely to do anything to befriend the Presbyterians. And, in fact, the prosecutions in the bishops' courts against marriages continued to multiply to such a degree, that the synod was compelled, in less than half a year, to renew their complaints to the Irish government, but with diminished hopes of redress. For their great protector, King William, died in the month of March, 1702. No heavier blow could have fallen upon the cause of toleration, and the interests of the Presbyterian Church in Ireland, than the death of this truly great man. By no party in Ireland was his loss more sincerely deplored than by the Presbyterians. Though the paramount influence of an intolerant faction defeated most of his plans in their favour, yet his very name was felt to be a tower of strength on their side, of which their opponents now rejoiced to see them deprived.

In proportion as the Presbyterians were grieved for the death of the King, the High Church party were filled with hopes that the time had now at length arrived, when they would be able to tread under foot the Dissenters, by not only depriving them of their right to hold office, by means of a Test Act, but by withholding that legal toleration which they professed themselves so ready to grant, the moment such an act were passed. This was a crisis, of which their vigilant and jealous foe, Bishop King, of Derry, was sure to avail himself, in order to push forward his schemes against them. He had scarcely heard of the King's death when he wrote to the bishop of Clogher, who was still in London, urging him to move the government, either to withdraw altogether the grant of Royal Bounty, which he alleged had been abused, for the purpose of erecting new congregations where they were not required ; or, if continued, to place it on such a footing as might render the ministers subservient to the government, and might introduce, at the same time, divisions among them. The bishop's proposal was, "The government ought to keep the disposal of the fund in their own hands, and encourage those only by it that comply as they would have them. By which means every particular minister would be at their mercy ; and it might be so managed as to be an instrument of division and jealousy amongst them." So anxious was he for the adoption of this mean and disgraceful plan for weakening the Presbyterian cause, that a few days afterwards he pressed it on the notice of Sir Robert Southwell, the secretary for Ireland, in a letter which is too characteristic and instructive to be withheld. He thus wrote in the end of March, 1702 :—

<sup>5</sup> Bishop Burnet, in his "History of his Own Time," says of Lord Rochester, while in Ireland at this time, that "he used much art in obliging people of all sorts, Dissenters as well as Papists," but that, notwithstanding, "such confidence was put in him by the High Church party, that they bore everything at his hands;" Oxford, edit., 1823, vol. iv., p. 524. It might be inferred from this passage, that the lord-lieutenant had done something to favour the Presbyterians, but I can discover no trace of any such proceeding on his part.

"As to the Dissenters of Ireland, they seem to be in great fear, and nothing could show more clearly the interest they thought themselves to have in his late majesty's favour, than the dejection that appears amongst them at present. I believe good use might be made of this if rightly managed ; and that right methods now used might bring in many of them. I find that they are now in most places come to that pass, that they do not plead conscience for their nonconformity ; but say they can't do it [i.e., conform to the Episcopal Church] safely, their dependence being on that party who are able to ruin them if they do not stick to them. The acts by which they keep up their party are, to take no apprentices that will not engage to go to the meeting with them ; to employ none nor trade with any that are not of their own sort, if they can help it ; to plant their land with such; and on all juries and other occasions to favour such more than justice. In all those they have been supported and countenanced, and he was looked on as disaffected to the government that formerly complained of them. —You may remember that they had £1200 per annum settled on them out of the treasury. Some of the most eminent of their ministers were trustees for it, which created a sort of dependence of the press [rest?] upon them, and enabled them to manage their affairs by joint councils; for these [trustees] were a general committee and centre of the unity for their whole body. They employed this money to settle meetings through the whole kingdom; and by this they maintained their emissaries, till they had seduced enough to support their teachers; by this means the most busy factious persons had the best shares. But I hope this will fail them for the future; or, if it be continued, it will be put in good hands that will give it [to] the most humble, peaceable, and complying; and some good use may be made of such contrivance if it must be continued.—I may tell you their insolence has much increased. They have insulted both the clergy and laity, and made our ecclesiastical offices more and more [despised?] every day; particularly assuming to themselves the privileges of celebrating marriages. Nay, there is one instance very remarkable of their confidence. A clergyman had purchased a lease on which there was a meeting-house; he refused to let them enjoy it gratis; on which they came in a body, broke it open, preached in it, and then pulled it down and carried away the materials. The clergyman brought a constable and a justice of the peace's warrant to quiet the riot. But they slighted both, and when examinations were taken against them, they puffed at the justices of the peace that took them, and gave out that they cared not what they did against them, for they had employed their agent in England to obtain from his majesty an order to stop proceedings. We hope that such actions as these will not be countenanced; for though, I believe, they were not approved before, yet they believed they were, which had much the same effect."<sup>6</sup>

<sup>6</sup> King's MS. Correspondence. It is not a little curious to observe how every piece of scandal to the discredit of Presbyterians found its way to the ears of Bishop King, no matter where it occurred. The incident to which he refers in the above letter, of the pulling down of a meeting-house, took place at Cookstown, in the diocese of Armagh, in the middle of the previous October. The following is a correct version of this affair, as recorded at the time, by William Stewart, Esq., of Killymoon, the magistrate alluded to by the bishop as having granted the warrant to quiet the alleged riot. It appears that the meeting-house in question had been built by the congregation, under the Rev. John Mackenzie, soon after the Revolution, partly on commonable land, and partly on a piece of ground recently taken off the common without authority, by a tenant of the above Mr. Stewart. This person, in 1695, surrendered his holding, and Mr. Stewart let it to one Logan; and, in his account of this affair, he declares that in his lease to Logan, he never intended to include any right to the ground on which the meeting-house stood, which he considered as part of the common, and for which the Presbyterians had never been asked for any rent by either of his two tenants. In the year 1701, the Rev. John Richardson, then rector of the parish, and a very violent High-Churchman, as appears by letters of his which I have seen, bought Logan's interest in the lease, evidently for the purpose of getting rid of this obnoxious conventicle. Having got possession of Logan's holding, he claimed the house and ground as his; and if we are to credit Bishop King, for Mr. Stewart does not mention the fact, he had laid a rent on the house, which it is probable the congregation had refused to pay. Accordingly, selecting, with malicious perversity, a week-day, on which there was divine service in the house, he closed up the doors and prevented all ingress. When the people assembled for worship, they very naturally felt indignant at this summary eviction out of their own property; and breaking open a passage through the side-wall, they entered, and having held their worship as usual, they immediately proceeded to unroof the house, which would be only thatched, and were removing the materials for the purpose of erecting it elsewhere, when the rector obtained a warrant from Mr. Stewart to apprehend the people as rioters, which was granted, and about twenty of them were afterwards bound over by the bench of magistrates to be tried for the riot at the next assizes. On the same day, Mr. Stewart examined the place, and declares that, according to the evidence of some of the oldest inhabitants there, who pointed out the mearings, the meeting-house was manifestly built altogether on the common. I am indebted to the kindness of the late Colonel Stewart, of Killymoon, for a perusal of the original memorandum relative to this matter by his ancestor, who died in 1705, and who concludes it thus—"The great noise of this affair, and various reports of it, made me think fit to give this account thereof; leaving to the judgment of the more understanding if the taking down and removing the house in manner as aforesaid will amount to a riot." I have not been able to ascertain the issue of the trial of these alleged rioters. The widow of Mr. Stewart, who was a daughter of Mr. Shaw, of Ballygelly, in the county of Antrim, and a decided Presbyterian, had the meeting-house rebuilt in the Killymoon demesne, out of reach of the intolerant rector, where it continued till the year 1764.

clergy during the whole of Queen Anne's reign. In the meantime, the former prosecutions against their marriages, so far from being checked, were encouraged, while indications appeared of a design to suspend the payment of the Royal Bounty grant. On both these matters the Synod of this year, 1702, were compelled once more to lay their complaints before the lord-lieutenant. But no redress was to be expected, when the advisers of the government were two bishops, and one of these, King, of Derry. These prelates, when consulted "about the complaint by the Presbyterians in the north of a fresh prosecution against their ministers on account of their marriages," took upon them to assure the lords-justices, that so far from that complaint being well-founded, those prosecutions had been less vigorous since the King's death than previously, "because the bishops would not give the Dissenters occasion to believe the expectations they [the bishops] had from her majesty's favour to the Church induced them to be more severe than otherwise they would be to these people." But they added, that such prosecutions were absolutely necessary, lest the Presbyterians "should be encouraged to make further encroachments on the Church, and their own clergy be too much discouraged by it."<sup>7</sup> With regard to the Royal Bounty grant, the Synod had also complained of its payment being suspended; but the lords-justices, in the beginning of July, reported to his excellency in England that this complaint was unfounded, though the only evidence they had was, not the production of the proper vouchers, but the bare assertion of a subordinate official in the treasury, afterwards proved to be unworthy of credit, who assured them that out of three quarters' salary then payable, the ministers had received two quarters; which, if paid at all, had probably been remitted after the complaint had been laid before the lord-lieutenant in the beginning of the previous month.<sup>8</sup> The government found it would be inexpedient to suspend this grant at the present conjuncture. The last patent had been made void by the death of King William, and Queen Anne was advised to issue a new one as formerly. Her letter or warrant, addressed to the Irish government, was dated in the month of December after her accession, and in the following March, letters patent were issued, under the great seal of Ireland, constituting thirteen ministers trustees for the distribution of the grant.<sup>9</sup> But though the Royal Bounty was thus continued, it appears that Bishop King's ungenerous suggestion to change the mode of its distribution, in order to render its recipients more directly dependent on the government, was not forgotten. The power of allocating the amount among the ministers was now withdrawn from the trustees, and transferred to the Lord Lieutenant, who was empowered to distribute it in such portions, and to such ministers, as he pleased. The Rev. Mr. Iredell, who had been commissioned to correspond with friends in London on this matter, produced to the Synod "a letter from the Rev. Daniel Williams, of London, showing that the Royal Bounty is secured, though to be distributed after another manner;" and he added, he had written to Mr. Williams, who had heard that the grant had been paid in unequal portions, to assure him that it had always been equally divided by the trustees among their brethren.<sup>10</sup> The under officer in the treasury was one Thomas Putland, who, five years afterwards, was convicted by the House of Commons of having "notoriously betrayed the trust reposed in him," and declared "unfit to serve in any public employment."—Journals of Irish Commons, vol. iii., p. 494.

<sup>10</sup> To corroborate Mr Iredell's statement, I find that there was sent over to Mr. Williams, to be laid before the government, the affidavit of Mr. Thomas Crawford. sworn before one John Humphrey, a public notary in Belfast, in August, 1703, stating grant was accordingly no longer entered on the Irish establishment in this form, "To Presbyterian ministers," as it had appeared during the previous reign. It henceforth stood thus : — "To be distributed among such of the Nonconforming ministers, by warrant from the Lord Lieutenant or other chief governor or governors for the time being, in such manner as he or they shall find necessary for our service or the good of that kingdom."<sup>11</sup> There is no reason to believe, however, that any real change in its mode of distribution took place, or that any attempt was made to interfere with the independence of individual ministers by means of this alteration. It appears to have been distributed in equal portions to all the ministers as before this change ; the government declining the invidious responsibility which was sought to be imposed on it for the base and sinister purposes suggested by Bishop King.

Meanwhile, the Presbyterian cause continued to prosper, and the number of ministers and congregations was steadily increasing. Some of the presbyteries had now grown too large for the proper discharge of their duties ; and it became necessary to reduce the number of members in each by the formation of new presbyteries, in order to secure a more efficient oversight of the various departments of the Church. Accordingly, the Synod, in this year, constituted two new presbyteries out of the overgrown Presbytery of Tyrone, and one out of that of the Lagan ; at the same time, an additional sub-Synod was formed, and appointed to meet statedly at Monaghan, so that there were now nine presbyteries, distributed into three sub-Synods, the superintendence of the whole being under one general Synod, which continued to meet annually at Antrim in the first week of June.<sup>12</sup> There were still that, since the first grant of the Royal Bounty by King William, he had been agent for its distribution, and that he had uniformly divided it, share and share alike, among the ministers.—State Paper Office, London.

great difficulties in obtaining an adequate supply of ministers for the increasing number of congregations. The Church, however, never relaxed her efforts to secure the services of pious and educated men. To prevent any candidates being admitted to the ministry, save those who were sound in the faith, the Synod, in 1698, had enacted, in conformity with the law of the Established Church of Scotland, that no young man should be licensed to preach the Gospel, unless "he subscribe the Confession of Faith in all the articles thereof, as the confession of his faith." But it was not deemed sufficient to have provided for the orthodoxy of ministers—efforts were now also made to elevate the standard of their professional education. The Synod in this year resolved not to enter any one on trials for license to preach unless he had studied divinity for no less than four years after having completed his course of philosophy.<sup>13</sup> By these means the ministry of the Presbyterian Church became every year more and more respectable in literary and theological attainments. They were all sincerely attached to the system of divine truth, as set forth in the standards of their own and their mother church of Scotland, where most of them had received their education.<sup>14</sup> To these raine, Armagh, Tyrone, sometimes called Cookstown, Monaghan, or Stonebridge, Derry, and Convoy. The sub-Synods were now styled, Belfast, Monaghan, and Lagan.

<sup>13</sup> It was afterwards resolved by the Synod, in 1707, that all young men on trial for the ministry, "should be able to interpret the Hebrew psalter, ad aperturam libri;" and, in 1709, the Synod appropriated £10 per annum out of the general fund to the Rev. Fulk White, minister of Broughshane, in the county of Antrim, "to encourage him in teaching Hebrew."—MS. Minutes of Synod.

<sup>14</sup> I find the names of very many ministers in Ulster in the matriculation-books of the University of Glasgow, from the Revolution downwards. Several also studied in the universities of St. Andrews and Edinburgh. The number of students from Ireland who frequented the University of Glasgow was very considerable. Thus, I may state, that in this year (1702) 43 Irish students matriculated, the total number of matriculations being 134. Many of these students were not designed for the Presbyterian Church, several of them were for the Episcopal Church, and many such continued to receive their education at Glasgow down to the CLOSE OF THIS CENTURY. I have seen a private diary, kept by the Rev. Robert Gordon, who was minister of Rathfriland from 1711 to 1762, from which it appears that he studied theology in Edinburgh, where, in 1704, he paid "fourteenpence weekly for his chamber." The session closed in June. Mr. Gordon was a native of Donaghadee, and we learn that, in summer, public worship was usually standards the fathers of the Church in Ulster had steadfastly adhered; and they had uniformly required, from those about to be ordained, either a verbal assent to them, or, as enacted a few years afterwards, a written, and subsequently a recorded subscription, to the Westminster Confession of Faith. No departure from the doctrines of this admirable confession had yet appeared among the ministers in Ulster, or elsewhere in Ireland; and when, in June of this year, the Rev. Thomas Emlyn, one of the ministers of Wood Street, in Dublin, was suspected of denying the deity of the Saviour, the other Presbyterian ministers of the metropolis were greatly alarmed at the prospect of so vital an error creeping in among their congregations. They instituted an inquiry into the matter, and Mr. Emlyn having avowed himself an Arian, he was immediately deposed by them from the ministry, as "holding a doctrine which struck at the foundation of Christianity, and was of too dangerous a consequence to be tolerated among them."<sup>15</sup> In the spring of the following year, he published a defence of his doctrinal views; and for this work, which was fairly and temperately written, he was most unjustly indicted for blasphemy, but not at the suggestion of any of the ministers; he was tried in the court of queen's bench, and found guilty, and suffered a cruel and unjustifiable imprisonment of above two years. In the north, no similar departure from the doctrines of the Gospel had occurred; ministers and people were firmly united in maintaining the same faith, and the

held at eight o'clock, at ten o'clock, and in the afternoon, and in winter twice each Sabbath; there was also public worship regularly every Wednesday. On Sunday, July 2, 1704, he was at the administration of the Lord's Supper at Killileagh; the service began about seven o'clock in the morning: there were seven tables. The next Sabbath he was at the Comber communion, where there were ten tables and a half; worship began at eight o'clock. I may add that this truly patriarchal minister, of above half a century's standing, was thrice married, and was the father of twenty-six children, comprising thirteen sons and thirteen daughters!

Church in Ulster was enjoying a remarkable degree of prosperity just at this crisis, when political changes were preparing new trials for her members.

Queen Anne, immediately after her accession, placed herself under the guidance of the High Church Tories. That party now gained a complete ascendancy, and the baneful effects of the change were soon felt by the Irish Presbyterians. The Earl of Rochester, uncle to the Queen, was continued in the office of lord-lieutenant, but he resided in England, and the government was administered by lords-justices. The first English Parliament in this reign met in the end of this year, and, early in the following year, 1703, they passed a bill which, by a clause added to it in the House of Lords,<sup>16</sup> and afterwards adopted by the commons,<sup>17</sup> extended to Ireland, the provisions of an Act of King William's last parliament,<sup>18</sup> by which all persons in office, civil, military, or ecclesiastical, were required to take the Oath of Abjuration. By this oath it was declared, that the person pretending formerly to be the Prince of Wales, and now to be King of England, by the title of James III., had no right or title whatsoever to the crown. By the first clause of the bill, the 1st of August following was declared to be the last day for taking this oath; and by the fourth clause, which extended the operation of the act to Ireland, it was enacted, by a solecism in legislation, that the oath should be taken by "all preachers and teachers of separate congregations," though such parties in Ireland had as yet no existence in the eye of the law, but were positively prohibited by statute, under severe penalties, from having any standing in the kingdom.<sup>19</sup> To carry out the provisions of this English statute, and to prepare for a new election, and the subsequent assembling of a parliament in Ireland, the Queen was anxious that Lord Rochester should return to his government. But he positively refused to leave England ; and in his room the Duke of Ormond was appointed lord-lieutenant, in the month of February. The Oath of Abjuration was almost universally taken by the Presbyterian ministers in Ireland. The only exceptions were the Rev. Mr. M'Bride, of Belfast, the Rev. Alexander M'Cracken, of Lisburn, the Rev. John Riddell, of Glenavy, or Ballinderry, and the Rev. Thomas Stirling, of Dervock ; the Rev. Gideon Jacque, and the Rev. Patrick Dunlop, formerly minister of Stonebridge, also joined with these ministers, but they did not at this period hold any pastoral charges in Ulster.<sup>20</sup> These non-jurors, as they were called, while they gave every assurance of their loyalty and allegiance to Queen Anne, and to the Protestant succession in the house of Hanover, scrupled to take the oath, for these, among other reasons—because they conceived it required them to swear that to be a fact of which they were not fully convinced, namely, that the Pretender was not the son of the late King James II.,<sup>21</sup> and because they conceived the terms of the oath bound them to conform to, or at least to protect and defend, the English Church. The High Church party eagerly seized on their refusal to brand them as Jacobites and disloyal, and to cast anomalous provision respecting Irish Dissenting ministers had been inadvertently copied from King William's Act, in which it was quite correct, for English Dissenting ministers were duly recognised and protected by their Toleration Act, whereas in Ireland they were still beyond the pale of the law—a fact probably not known to the new advisers of her Majesty. Irish Presbyterians have, down to very recent times, found English ministries, whether Whigs or Tories, very ignorant of their history and position in Ireland.

the same reproach on the Presbyterians generally, while many of their own friends lamented this unseasonable scrupulosity. Some unpleasant proceedings took place in the Presbytery of Belfast, owing to certain observations which the Rev. Mr. Malcome, of Dunmurry, had made, on the refusal of his neighbour, the Rev. Mr. M'Cracken, of Lisburn, to take the oath. This case was carried by appeal to the subsequent Synod, who found both parties to be more or less culpable. At the same time, an overture or resolution was unanimously adopted by the Synod, inculcating mutual forbearance, and exhorting ministers to avoid all personal reflections on one another, whether in public or in private, which might introduce divisions among them, and thus impair their influence as a body.

The non-juring ministers were in the first instance unmolested. Efforts were indeed made, without loss of time, to put the law in execution against them, but happily without effect. Mr. M'Bride, of Belfast, who afterwards suffered so much for refusing to take the oath, has given the following account of these unsuccessful attempts:—"Although there was a warrant appointed by the lord-lieutenant to be written, and was also by the sub-secretary written, to prosecute Mr. M'Cracken and me, yet a special friend of ours dissuaded the Duke of Ormond from signing it, by letting him know that it would be looked upon as very partial to spare all the popish priests and some of their own clergy who are non-jurants, and only to pursue us: As also it would look ill if the government should prosecute us for transgressing an act made in England and not as yet ratified in Ireland, when there are standing laws in this kingdom on which they might pursue us all; and he wished that government would not begin to be prosecutors. These arguments prevailed with the Duke of Ormond so far that he would not sign the warrant; so it fell." Mr. M'Bride then adds—"The next attempt was, that the judge at the assizes gave it in charge to the grand jury of the county of Antrim to present non-jurants. But this also failed ; for tho' a considerable part of them were episcopal, yet they would not present us. It was next reported with great confidence that the sheriff of the county had a special warrant to apprehend me. But I have found from himself that to be false, and have his assurance that if anything of that nature come to his hand, we shall have seasonable warning : Whereupon we continue in the exercise of our ministry as formerly."<sup>22</sup>

On the 21st of September, the Irish Parliament met, and as the recent elections had thrown a preponderating majority into the hands of the High Church party, they soon displayed their hostility to the Presbyterians. During the first month of the session, the House of Commons, in one or two instances, indicated but too clearly the spirit by which they were actuated. On the 19th of October, their committee on public accounts recommended that Mr. M'Bride and Mr. M'Cracken should be struck off the grant of Royal Bounty for refusing to take the Oath of Abjuration.<sup>23</sup> A few days afterwards, however, the house agreed to a resolution which would have altogether superseded this recommendation of their committee. They resolved—"That the pension of twelve hundred pounds per annum, granted to the Presbyterian ministers in Ulster, is an unnecessary branch of the establishment.<sup>24</sup> Thus one great object of the policy of Bishop King, who had been removed in the spring of this year from Derry to the archbishopric of Dublin, was accomplished, so far at least as a resolution of the House of Commons could avail; but, fortunately for the Presbyterian ministers, his efforts to deprive them of this grant proved in the end abortive. The government would not venture to carry out this vindictive measure; and, notwithstanding the adverse vote of the commons, the grant was continued as formerly on the fiscal establishment of the kingdom.<sup>25</sup> Nor, as already stated, is there any trace that the other suggestion of Bishop King, which had been formally adopted by the government, to alter the mode of distributing this grant, so as to sow jealousies among the ministers, was carried into effect, although, from his new position as archbishop of Dublin, his influence with the government was greatly increased.

<sup>22</sup> Stirling's MS. Letters, Univ. Libr., Glasgow, vol. iv., No. 116. Another unsuccessful attempt was afterwards made to bring these non-jurors into trouble. Mr. M'Cracken, of Lisburn, says :—"Before the parliament rose [in November, 1703] there was a letter sent to the speaker of the House of Commons acquainting him that there were some non-jurants, and desiring that there might be some course taken with them. I hear the writer named only Mr. M'Bride and me. This was read in the house, and gave occasion to some to speak upon it. But the overruling providence of God so ordered that some who were strangers to us, and not of our persuasion, appeared against it, and so nothing was done : One reason was, because they who had written the letter had not the confidence to put their name to it." <sup>23</sup> Journals of the Irish Commons, vol. iii., page 61. Mr. Riddel, being minister in a rural district, escaped notice for some time, while Mr. Stirling does not appear to have been molested at Dervock until the latter part of this reign. With regard to the latter minister, I may here mention the singular fact, that his father, two uncles, and two cousins, all of the name of Stirling, and one of whom was Principal of Glasgow College for many years, were ministers of the Church of Scotland. 4

But while the ministers escaped these attempts to injure them in respect of the Royal Bounty, a much more serious grievance was preparing to be imposed on the entire Presbyterian population throughout the kingdom. This was one of the bitter fruits of that violent opposition to all Dissenters, whether Protestants or Romanists, which burst forth after the accession of Queen Anne. The Roman Catholics were the first to feel the effects of the prevalent spirit. They had already suffered much, in direct violation of the treaty of Limerick; but it is from the commencement of this reign that

<sup>25</sup> Mr. M'Cracken, writing from Lisburn to the brother of Wodrow, the Scottish historian, on Dec. 3, 1703, says:—"The parliament hath taken from us that £1,200 the Queen granted and we enjoyed in King William's time. But it is thought by some the Queen will continue it, which she may do notwithstanding of this vote in the house." Wodrow's MS. Letters, vol. ii., No. 58. Mr. M'Bride, in a letter to Principal Stirling, of Glasgow College, dated, Belfast, June 12, 1704, says:—"We are informed that the Duke of Ormond hath prevailed with the Queen to continue our pension."—Stirling's MS. Letters, vol. iv., No. 116.

that iniquitous series of anti-popery laws began, which have been the source of so much misery to Ireland, and the mischievous effects of which, though now happily repealed, are still to be traced in many of the social evils of that ill-governed land. Although these most unjust and oppressive laws were passed for the sake of the Established Church, yet the Presbyterians were so blinded by the headstrong and unreasoning anti-papal spirit of those days, as to concur but too cordially in their enactment. And it was a singular occurrence, an instance, perhaps, of righteous requital,<sup>26</sup> that they themselves, after having given their aid in parliament to carry one of the most cruel of these statutes against the Romanists, should, by a clause added to that very statute, be deprived of their own civil rights, and subjected in their turn to serious grievances on account of their religion. The act now referred to was framed by the House of Commons in the early part of their first session; and, in the form of "Heads of a bill to prevent the further growth of Popery," was sent to England, in the middle of November, for the consideration of the Queen and her ministers. In this shape, in which it had received the support of the Presbyterian members, its provisions applied exclusively to the Romanists, and were most oppressive and unjustifiable. Early in February, 1704, it was transmitted in due form to Dublin, under the great seal, in order to receive the final sanction of parliament. In this form it was competent for the Irish legislature only to adopt or to reject a bill; no material amendments or omissions could be made without a new transmission to England. When laid before parliament, the Presbyterians, to their great dismay, found that an entirely new clause had been introduced into it by the English ministry, requiring "all persons holding any office, civil or military, or receiving any pay or salary from the crown, or having command or place of trust from the sovereign," to take the sacrament in the Established Church within three months after every such appointment. In other words, the Sacramental Test, which it had been so long the object of the Irish bishops to impose upon the Presbyterians, was thus at length on the eve of being carried into effect. Should this unexpected provision be enacted, the Presbyterians would be summarily deprived of all the public offices and places of trust which they then held, and be rendered incapable of being ever afterwards appointed to similar offices.

Various conjectures have been formed to account for the introduction of this clause against the Presbyterians into a bill which they themselves had supported avowedly "to prevent the further growth of Popery." It has been alleged that it originated with Lords Rochester and Nottingham, who were opposed to the bill as sent over from Ireland, lest the Emperor of Germany should break off his alliance with England, because of the grievances which it imposed on his co-religionists, the Romanists of Ireland; and that those noblemen, being afraid to oppose it openly in the face of the violent anti-popery spirit then raging, had recourse to the expedient of adding to it the Sacramental Test clauses, in order that it might encounter the opposition of the Presbyterians, who, it was calculated, when supported by the Irish Whigs, would be able to throw out the bill.<sup>27</sup> But this statement is by no means probable. The Emperor of Germany was not at all likely to sympathise with the Irish Romanists, who were well known to be in the interest of France, his most formidable rival. The noblemen who introduced the clause were uniformly distinguished for their bitter hostility to both Romanists and Dissenters. They could therefore have no motive for wishing to defeat the bill; and even if they had, they must have known, from the parallel case of the English Test Act in 1673, that the Presbyterians, so far from opposing the bill, were more likely to overlook their own grievances, in their zeal for protecting the Protestant religion against the Romanists, and to support the measure, even with the obnoxious clause. Lord Rochester and his colleagues must also have known that the Presbyterian party in the Irish Parliament, especially since the last election, were too few to be able to defeat the bill, in the face of all the weight and influence with which the High Church party would hasten to support a measure so congenial to their feelings, and so long desired by them. This very parliament, too, had already given such unequivocal proofs of their hostility to the Presbyterians, as must have satisfied any statesman of ordinary discernment that they were fully prepared and able to pass the bill, even had it been more oppressive to that party.

<sup>27</sup> The only original authority I know of for this account of the motives of the English ministers is Burnet, in the "History of his Own Times," vol. v., pp. 102, 103, which has been followed by all subsequent historians, to whom it is unnecessary to refer. But we now know that comparatively little dependence is to be placed on his statements with regard to matters which, like the present case, either did not fall within his own immediate knowledge, or involved party feelings. Calamy, in the "Historical Account of his Own Life," vol. ii., page 28, written at the time, merely says that it was commonly reported that Lords Nottingham and Rochester inserted the clause in the privy council, after the bill had been sent over from Ireland, all which was quite true; but he does not allude to the rumour of their intending thereby to defeat the bill, and this is the part of Burnet's account which I think is improbable and unfounded.

All the evidence now extant, with regard to the introduction of this clause, which is unfortunately very scanty,<sup>28</sup> proves that it was a deliberately planned scheme of the High Church faction for accomplishing their favourite measure of humbling and oppressing the Presbyterians, and it was very dexterously carried out. Had the clause in question been submitted to the Irish commons, as one of the heads of the proposed bill, when it was quite competent for them to have omitted it without endangering or interfering with the primary object of the bill, it would most probably have been opposed so vigorously, and such representations would have been made by the Whigs in England, that the government would scarcely, in the face of this preliminary opposition, have persisted in retaining the clause. It was, therefore, not brought forward in the first instance in Ireland; it was carefully withheld in order to be silently inserted in the transmitted bill, when the opposition of the Presbyterians would be too late to be effectual; when their arguments could be met by an appeal to their antipopery feelings, not to lose so valuable a bill by their unseasonable opposition; and when their hostility could be disarmed by the assurance that they would now obtain an act of toleration, while the offensive clause might soon be repealed. The precedent set in the passing of the English Test Act obviously suggested to their enemies in the administration the mode in which this corresponding act should be introduced into Ireland, and its success justified the sagacity, or rather the cunning of the government.

That the Sacramental Test was inserted in the bill, not with the view of defeating it, but with the sincere and earnest purpose of its becoming law, is apparent from all the information that can now be obtained of its origin in England, and its reception in Ireland. On the former point, important information is afforded by Sir Gilbert Dolben, Bart., one of the judges of the court of common pleas in Ireland, a violent High-Churchman, who was then in London. Writing, in January, 1704, to the Irish lord-chancellor, Sir Richard Cox, who had already signalled himself by his opposition in the Irish privy-council, in 1697, to a toleration act,<sup>29</sup> after referring to several alterations which had been made in the bill by the English council, at which he appears to have been present,

Justice Dolben says—"But the noblest amendment is, that all persons having any office, civil or military, which includes offices in corporations, shall be obliged to take the oaths and to receive the sacrament according to the usage of the Church of Ireland; and in default of so doing the office to be void, and whoever shall continue to act in his respective office after having neglected thus to qualify himself within the time limited by the bill, as amended, shall incur the penalties and disabilities as are imposed by our [English] Test Act. This amendment was made by her majesty's particular direction in council, upon a due sense of the laws being defective in that great point: And I am charged to acquaint your lordship that the faithful Church of England's friends do most earnestly beseech his grace [the lord-lieutenant] to exert his utmost interest in favour of this amendment, wherein his grace will do an act tending highly to his own honour as well as to the advantage of the Church."<sup>30</sup> This unimpeachable testimony clearly proves that, so far from there being any design to defeat the bill by the introduction of the Sacramental Test, the High Church party, from the Queen downwards, were sincerely anxious that the whole bill, as it affected both Romanists and Presbyterians, should pass the Irish Parliament and become law.

There are but few materials for ascertaining how the bill was received in Ireland after its return from England, with the addition of the Sacramental Test. On the 14th of February, it was presented to the House of Commons, and read the first time. Three days afterwards, it was read a second time, without a division, when the leading Romanists petitioned to be heard by counsel against it, which was granted. At this stage of its progress, there is extant a letter from Sir Edward Southwell to the secretary of state, the Earl of Nottingham, dated the 19th of February, which exhibits the feelings of the Presbyterians on the Test clause, as ascertained by the government officials. "When first the news came of the Sacramental Test being added, there was some noise made thereat by the Dissenters; and some more busy than others endeavoured to try what strength there might be in the house to favour the taking it out. But they met so little encouragement, and even those gentlemen were so sensible of the great advantages accruing by the bill for suppressing the popish interest, that they have almost declined any farther talk about it, and I see nothing to interrupt a good conclusion."<sup>31</sup> The tide was now running so strong against dissent, that the Presbyterians and their friends in Dublin appear to have been soon disheartened, and to have been early convinced of the impossibility of defeating this oppressive measure. At all events, whether despairing of success, or perhaps deluded by hopes of its speedy repeal, they neither petitioned nor prayed to be heard by counsel against it. On the 22d of February, the counsel for the Roman Catholics pleaded their cause at the bar of the house. The principal speaker was Sir Theobald Butler, who delivered a most effective speech, the substance of which has been preserved.<sup>32</sup> Not content with proving the manifest breach of treaty with the Romanists, with which the bill was chargeable throughout, he also pointed out how undeservedly the Presbyterians were treated by the imposition of the Sacramental Test. "Surely," said this Roman Catholic advocate of Presbyterian rights, with great force and truth, "the Dissenters did not do anything to deserve worse at the hands of the government than other Protestants. On the contrary, it is more than probable that if they had not put a stop to the career of the Irish army at Enniskillen and Londonderry, the settlement of the government, both in England and Scotland, might not have proved so easy as it thereby did. For if that army had got to Scotland, when they had a great many friends there in arms, waiting only their coming to join them, it is easy to think what the consequence would have been to both those kingdoms. And these Dissenters were then thought fit for command, both civil and military, and were no less instrumental in contributing to reducing the kingdom than any other Protestants. To pass a bill now to deprive them of their birthrights for those their good services, would surely be a most unkind return, and the worst reward ever granted to a people so deserving. Whatever the Papists may be supposed to have deserved, the Dissenters certainly stand as clean in the face of the present government as any other people whatever; and, if this is all the return they are like to get, it will be but a slender encouragement, if ever occasion should require, for others to pursue their example." The arguments and appeals of counsel were, of course, of no avail; the bill passed through the committee, and was reported to the house on the following day, and ordered to be engrossed.

An attempt was now made to soothe the Presbyterians, by leading them to believe that they would now at length obtain the legal toleration of which they had been so long deprived. For, immediately after the bill had been carried through the committee, where the Presbyterians made the only opposition which they appear to have offered during its progress, the house ordered that leave be given to bring in heads of a bill "to give such toleration to Protestant Dissenters in Ireland as is by law allowed Protestant Dissenters in England."<sup>33</sup> So far the High Church party seemed disposed to act at least consistently, by granting legal security to the Presbyterian Church, now when the only obstacle to such a measure had been removed, by the imposition of the Sacramental Test. But that this resolution of the commons was a mere sham, is evident from various circumstances. The duty of preparing the proposed Toleration Act was devolved on four country members of comparatively little weight in the house or kingdom.<sup>34</sup> Had there been any real intention to carry such a measure, it would have been consigned to some members of the administration, or their supporters. Accordingly, no further step was taken in the matter, and no allusion whatever is made to it in the correspondence between the Irish and English governments during the remainder of this reign. On the 25th of February, the bill was read a third time, and sent to the lords; and, on the following day, Sir Edward Southwell again wrote to the Earl of Nottingham, giving the following official version of the arguments urged in the commons, when in committee on the bill, both for and against the Sacramental Test.<sup>35</sup> "All the clauses against the Papists passed unanimously, till we came to the Sacramental Test, and upon this we had above two hours' debate. It was objected that this was creating a new distinction in this country, of Church and Dissenter, when there ought only to be that of Protestant and Papist; that it weakened our Protestant interest thereby when we were provoking the Papists afresh; that it was an ill requital to the Dissenters who had so signalised themselves in the defence of Derry and the northern parts in the late revolution in this kingdom; that, in case of any foreign invasion,

it put them out of capacity, without great penalty, of showing the same zeal; and that it was more sensible [i.e., more grievous] to the Dissenters here, because they have no toleration by law as in England. And some very few in the height of their resentment were pleased to say, they thought this was added on purpose to hazard the bill. All these matters were very sufficiently answered, and showed that no particular hardship was designed towards them; that, in fact, there were more of the Church at Enniskillen, and at least one-half at Derry; that even in the north above eight in ten of the gentry were Churchmen; that tho' in those parts the commonalty might exceed in Dissenters, all parish offices and duties were excused in this bill; that in cases of public danger and invasion, all people were obliged, both in duty and interest, to oppose the common enemy; that if ever we hoped a union with England, it could not be expected they would ever do it but upon the same terms that they stand upon; and that in England the Dissenters have both writ for and preached conformity where it was for their interest and advantage. And as to this, I must observe that the Dissenters here have writ very earnestly against occasional conformity, which they now wish had been let alone. When at last this paragraph was put to the vote, there were not above twenty negatives."<sup>36</sup> The bill passed rapidly through the House of Lords, where the Roman Catholic petitioners were again heard by counsel, and it received the royal assent on the 4th of March, the day on which the session terminated.

Thus was consummated this flagrant injustice towards the Presbyterians of Ireland, who were not only deeply insulted

<sup>36</sup> There is reason to believe that Sir Edward Southwell estimated too low the amount of the opposition in the commons to the Sacramental Test. De Foe, in his "Parallel," &c., says that it was opposed by nearly a hundred members of the Established Church; but though he appears to have had access to the best sources of information, this estimate of his probably errs in the other direction by being too high. See "Writings of the Author of the True-Born Englishman," vol. ii., page 381.

and injured, but were cajoled and deceived throughout the whole affair. The jealous and hostile feelings of the bishops and High Church party were now fully satiated. They had turned the Dissenters out of all public places of trust and emolument; and having secured that object, which they formerly alleged was the only obstacle to the granting of a legal toleration, they now conveniently forgot those declarations, and withheld the promised toleration. The Irish Presbyterians were now, therefore, in a much worse position than their brethren in England. Like them, indeed, they were excluded from the public service, but their Church was still unrecognised in law, while the English Dissenters enjoyed full security for their worship and government. The disabilities created by this act extended to all civil and military appointments under the crown. No Presbyterian could henceforth hold any office in any department of the army or navy, nor in the customs, excise, or post-office, nor in or about any of the courts of law, whether in Dublin or in the provinces, nor in the magistracy of the kingdom, without conforming to the Established Church. They were also excluded by this bill from all municipal offices in the corporate towns of Ireland. A remarkable instance of its operation in this respect occurred in the city of Derry. No fewer than ten out of twelve aldermen, and fourteen out of twenty-four burgesses, being Presbyterians, were turned out of their respective offices;<sup>37</sup> and that, too, in a city which most of these very men had contributed to preserve, by their services and sufferings during the siege, <sup>37</sup> The names of these deeply injured members of the Presbyterian Church deserve to be recorded here. The aldermen were Alexander Lecky, James Lennox, Henry Long, Horace Kennedy, Edward Brooks, Robert Shannon, all these had been mayors; William Mackie, John Cowan, Hugh Davey, these three had served the office of sheriff; and William Smith. The burgesses were Alexander Skipton and Joseph Davey, then sheriffs; John Harvey, chamberlain; Robert Harvey, Robert Gamble, John Dixon, Francis Neville, John Rankin, Joseph Morrison, Archibald Cunningham, James Anderson, David Cairns, John Cunningham, and James Strong. I am also indebted for these names to my nephew, Edward Reid, Esq., of Derry, who extracted them from the records of the corporation.

but in which they were now ignominiously branded by the government as unworthy to hold the humblest offices ! Most of the magistrates throughout Ulster were in like manner deprived of their commissions, not more than two or three having qualified according to the act, and great difficulty was experienced in filling their places ; so much so, that "men of little estates, youths, new-comers, and clergymen, having nothing to recommend them to the dignity of magistrates but their going to church," were placed on the commission of the peace.<sup>38</sup> So general were the words of the act, that the ministers at first conceived they would be prevented by it from accepting their portion of the Royal Bounty ; for it provided that every one receiving a salary, under a patent from the crown should be required to take the sacrament in the Established Church, under severe penalties if this form were neglected. Under these circumstances, the Synod in this year appointed Mr. Iredell to consult the solicitor-general, who was also the

<sup>38</sup> De Foe's "Parallel," &c. The following testimonies from three Irish ministers amply corroborate De Foe's statement in the text. The Rev. Mr. M'Cracken, writing to a friend in Scotland in July, 1704, says—"The Sacramental Test is going fast on with all concerned, and some officers in the excise, customs, and army, that were of ours, have taken it ; but none of the justices of the peace nor mayors of corporations that I hear of."—Wodrow's MS. Letters, vol. ii., No. 75. And, in October following, he adds—"There are some who had offices that have taken it, and so have qualified themselves to continue therein. As I shall suppose this was done without consulting ministers of our way, so I hope none of ours will take upon them to defend it. Tho' it is known Baxter was for it, I am persuaded the generality of the north will be against it. But what the south may do I cannot tell ; only a little time will show whether they will receive the testers as orderly members of their congregations to communicate again with them as formerly."—Ibid, vol. ii., No. 76. The Rev. Mr. Kirkpatrick, then minister of Templepatrick, writing to Principal Stirling, of Glasgow college, in November following, says—"The generality of our people who had places of trust have continued firm and steadfast to our principles, notwithstanding of the temptation they were led into by the Sacramental Test, and so have laid down their commissions. But some few have complied, as must be expected in all such cases."—Stirling's MS. Letters, vol. iv., No. 118. And the Rev. Mr. Lang of Loughbrickland furnishes this additional testimony :—"All Dissenters, except a few who have conformed so far as to communicate with the Church, have let their offices fall, to the great prejudice of the country. Several able justices of the peace being by this act rendered incapable to serve their queen and country not to name officers of the army, &c.), and their places are generally filled with raw, inexperienced men, and particularly with clergymen."—Wodrow's MS. Letters, vol. vi., No. 59.

speaker of the House of Commons, Allan Brodrick, Esq., whether they "might with safety take the R. D. if tendered, considering the late act." His opinion, as reported to the Synod in the following year, was, that they might continue to receive it with safety, inasmuch as it did not accrue to them out of any office or place of trust bestowed by the sovereign.

This ungrateful treatment which the Irish Presbyterians thus experienced at the hands of the government was felt and resented in England. "Strong representations were made to the court by those who thought they had influence, but nothing could avail against the bigotry of the ministers." That indefatigable writer, Daniel De Foe, though a prisoner in Newgate for his inimitable satire, "The Shortest Way with the Dissenters," took up his pen in their behalf, and early in this year published a pamphlet, to which he gave the sarcastic title—"The Parallel; or Persecution of Protestants the Shortest Way to Prevent the Growth of Popery in Ireland."<sup>39</sup> He shows himself to have been remarkably well acquainted with the history and position of the Irish Presbyterians. He vindicates their claims to a different treatment from what they had now received with great vigour, and exposes with considerable force of argument and wit, the dishonourable conduct of government. On this point he observes, in the style of that period—"It seems somewhat hard, and savours of the most scandalous ingratitude that the very people who drank deepest of the popish fury, and were the most vigorous to show both their zeal and their courage in opposing tyranny and Popery, and on the foot of whose forwardness and valour the Church of Ireland recovered herself from her low condition, should now be requited with so injurious a treatment as to be linked with those very Papists they fought against." Referring to an observation of Archbishop King,<sup>40</sup> in 1691, that the Dissenters' liberality to the episcopal clergy, when impoverished by the war, "ought to be remembered to their honour," De Foe very pointedly remarks, that "instead of being remembered to their honour, they have been ranked amongst the worst enemies to the Church, and chained to a bill to prevent the growth of Popery. This will certainly be no encouragement to the Dissenters to join with their brethren the next time the Papists shall please to take arms and attempt their throats. Not but they may perhaps be fools enough, as they always were, to stand in the gap; but if ever the crisis should arise, would not all the world call them fools to do anything again that merits to be 'remembered to their honour?' If this be the Church's method of 'remembering' favours, if this be their returns of gratitude, let them fight for them next time that dare trust their temper." Towards the conclusion of the pamphlet, he thus ridicules the introduction of such a measure into an act avowedly "to prevent the further growth of Popery:"—"Will any man in the world tell us that to divide the Protestants is a way to prevent the further growth of Popery, when their united force is little enough to keep it down? This is like sinking the ship to drown the rats, or cutting off the foot to cure the corns. This would merit some satire, if the case was not really too sad and serious to bear a banter. If these are Church of Ireland politics, for shame, gentlemen, never reproach the native Irish for winking when they shoot; for never marksman took such aim as this. 'Tis such a tale of a tub, the very Irish themselves must of necessity laugh at it; for what could be of more service to the popish interest in that kingdom than to see the Protestants thus divided and persecuting each other?"<sup>41</sup>

<sup>41</sup> In this valuable pamphlet, De Foe states a fact which I have not seen mentioned elsewhere. In his writings, ut supra, vol. ii., page 391, he says: "The late Queen Mary had so true a sense on her mind of the courage and fidelity of the Dissenters in

All the reasoning or influence which the Presbyterians and their friends in both kingdoms could employ, failed to effect any change in the disposition of the government towards them. At the reassembling of the parliament in the spring of the following year, a few leading Presbyterian gentlemen, who had suffered under the test clause, presented a petition to parliament against it. These petitioners were Arthur Upton, William Hamilton, Archibald Edmonstone, William Cunningham, William Cairns, David Buttle, and William Mackie, Esquires.<sup>42</sup> Their petition was presented to the House of Commons on the 14th of March, "on behalf of themselves and the rest of the Protestant dissenting subjects of Ireland;" and, according to the meagre entry on the journals of the house, it merely set

Derry, that she gave them a mark of her royal favour in money, to be employed to rebuild their market-house, and to erect a new meeting-house in that city."

<sup>42</sup> The following brief notices of these gentlemen may be interesting to many of my readers:—ARTHUR UPTON was the head of the family of Castle Upton, near Templepatrick, now ennobled by the title of Viscount Templeton. He was now advanced in years, and had been a consistent loyalist and Presbyterian through all the trying vicissitudes of the seventeenth century. He had refused, like the other Presbyterians, to take the oath of fidelity to the commonwealth, and was consequently ordered to remove to Munster; (Chap. XVI., Note 1, and App.) He early appeared for King William, raised a regiment from among his tenantry, took an active part in the Revolution, and formed one of the deputation from the Irish Presbyterians who waited on the King in London; (Chap. XIX., Note 72, and text.) He had been a representative in parliament for the county of Antrim during forty years: but he had now retired, and his son and successor, Colonel Clotworthy Upton, worthily occupied his place, attended the Synod as elder from Templepatrick, and warmly supported the Presbyterian interests there. WILLIAM HAMILTON was of Killileagh, in the county of Down, a lineal descendant of the first Lord Clanboy and Earl of Clanbrassil, and inherited a part of his estate. ARCHIBALD EDMONSTONE was of Redhall, or Broadisland, near Carrickfergus, but was generally known by his Scottish designation, the Laird of Duntreath. He was the ancestor, in a direct line, of the present Sir Archibald Edmonstone, Bart., of Duntreath, in Scotland. So long as this ancient family resided in Ulster, they were the steady and attached friends of the Presbyterian Church; (Chap. XII., Note 27.) WILLIAM CUNNINGHAM lived within the bounds of the Presbytery of Tyrone, and I believe was the head of the family of that name now of Springhill, near Moneymore. WILLIAM CAIRNS was of the family of that name in Monaghan; he was at this time a merchant in Dublin, and one of the representatives in parliament for the borough of Belfast. DAVID BUTTLE was an eminent merchant in Belfast, and probably a descendant of the Rev. David Buttle, minister of Ballymena; (see Chap. XII., Note 8.) WILLIAM MACKIE was of the city of Derry, where he had served as an officer during the siege, and was one of the aldermen who had been turned out of office the previous year by the Sacramental Test.

forth "some difficulties they lie under by the clause in the act to prevent the further growth of Popery, relating to the Sacramental Test.<sup>43</sup> A copy of this petition has been preserved,<sup>44</sup> which shows how imperfectly its purport and prayer are here described. In it they exhibit pretty fully the unshaken loyalty of the Presbyterian body, and the important services rendered by it to the Protestant religion and the liberties of the empire. They complain of their having been disabled by the clause in question "from executing any public trust for the service of her majesty, the Protestant religion, and their country." They point out the impolicy of dividing the Protestants, while the Romanists were six to one of the entire Protestant population; and they conclude with praying the house "to order a bill for restoring such a considerable part of the Protestants of this kingdom to a capacity of defending her majesty's sacred person and government, and the Protestant succession as by law established."

The unaltered temper of the commons was clearly evinced by the manner in which this petition was received. Sir Edward Southwell, writing on the evening of the day on which it was presented to Mr. Secretary Hedges, in London, has given the following account of its reception:—"This day a petition was presented to the house in the name of the Dissenters in the north, setting forth their zeal for the Protestant interest, and praying that the clause for the Sacramental Test passed in our Act of Popery last session might be repealed. There were many warm speeches upon it, but they generally ran, whether to lay the petition on the table, or to give them leave to withdraw it, or to reject it. And it being declared that it was not intended it should revive again, the house agreed to use the civilest way in laying it on the table, and at the same time ordered no notice should be taken thereof in the printed votes."<sup>45</sup>

So discouraging a reception as this was could scarcely have been expected by the Presbyterians. It must have convinced them that it was in vain to look for any redress of their grievances from this parliament, which, the longer it sat, became only the more intolerant. Among the indications of its hostility is to be enumerated an attempt to abolish their privilege of celebrating marriage. Two years before, there had been a report that parliament intended to prohibit these marriages, but it proved to be groundless, or at least premature.<sup>46</sup> The prosecutions in the ecclesiastical courts, however, were still carried on against both ministers and people; and it is curious to find it stated that, besides this source of annoyance, some of the High Church bigots had been pleased to take offence at Presbyterians for pursuing their ordinary labours on the week-day festivals in the Anglican calendar, and had even prosecuted several in the bishops' courts for this new offence.<sup>47</sup> The Irish government at this period appears to have discountenanced, as far as they could, these prosecutions, especially those against marriages. In the autumn of the year 1704, when certain members of the Presbyterian congregation of Lisburn had, along with several others, been excommunicated by the ecclesiastical courts for having been married by their own ministers, and refusing to acknowledge themselves guilty of fornication, Mr. M'Cracken laid the case before the lord-chancellor, Sir Richard Cox, with the view of obtaining relief. His lordship appears to have afforded all that was in his power, but this amounted to no more than a promise that he would take care no writ for seizing excommunicated persons should issue,<sup>48</sup> which, though it freed them from the dread of a gaol, left them still liable to be imprisoned under a less tolerant government. Their opponents then brought the question of these marriages before parliament. Early in March there was introduced into the House of Commons a bill for preventing clandestine or rather forced marriages, containing certain clauses, the effect of which would have been to render Presbyterian marriages null and void in law. Their friends in parliament, however, remonstrated successfully against this application of the measure; and as Mr. M'Bride wrote to a friend in Scotland—the speaker, Mr. Brodrick, managed that matter so well as to get these clauses struck out.” In this form the bill was transmitted to England; and he adds, “if it come over without amendments, it declares those only to be clandestine marriages where there is no proclamation of banns or dispensations [i.e., a special license] from the bishop.”<sup>49</sup> The projected bill, however, was not returned from England; and though several statutes regulating marriage in Ireland were passed during this reign, no attempt was again made to interfere with the validity of Presbyterian marriages.<sup>50</sup>

After a brief recess, during which the lord-lieutenant made a progress through Ulster, and received loyal and dutiful addresses from the Presbyterian ministers at Antrim, Derry, and Monaghan,<sup>51</sup> the parliament reassembled in May, and their hostility to Dissenters was still unabated. They soon after adopted certain resolutions which were intended to inflict additional injury on the Presbyterian Church, and to bring down the penalties of the law on individual ministers. The High Church party in the north had been long dissatisfied with the establishment and success of the philosophy school at Killileagh, superintended by the Rev. James M'Alpine. They longed to see it forcibly closed, in order to check, if not altogether prevent, further supplies of candidates for the Presbyterian ministry. But they were unable to effect their purpose by the ordinary course of law; for Mr. M'Alpine had obtained a license from the chancellor of the diocese, and had duly taken all the oaths required of teachers. They now, therefore, had recourse to the House of Commons, whose temper at this crisis was so congenial with their own, and induced them to adopt the following resolution, which, though general, was intended to apply solely to this particular school:—"Resolved: That the erecting and continuing any seminary for the instruction and education of youth in principles contrary to the Established Church and government, tends to create and perpetuate misunderstandings among Protestants,"—a reason which it was singularly inconsistent for those to urge who had created much more fatal and mischievous misunderstandings among Protestants by their Sacramental Test. The next object of the same narrow-minded party in parliament was to call forth the dormant penalties of the law against the three or four loyal, though conscientiously scrupulous ministers, who had refused to take the oath of abjuration. Hitherto no one in Ulster had been base enough to put the law in execution against them; for they were well known to be sincerely opposed to the Pretender's claims, and ardently attached to the cause of the Queen and the Protestant succession. This forbearance was galling to their bigoted opponents, who now obtained from the commons this resolution, to countenance them in the effort they were determined to make to punish these ministers:—"Resolved: That preaching or teaching in separate congregations by persons who have not taken the oath of abjuration, and hearing, maintaining, and countenancing such persons, tends to defeat the succession of the crown in the Protestant line, and to encourage and advance the interest of the pretended Prince of Wales." Still, another link in the chain of persecution was wanting before it could be made to reach their victims. It was necessary to overcome the reluctance of the northern magistracy, who were averse from enforcing against these loyal ministers penalties which were designed to apply solely to disloyal and traitorous Jacobites. Accordingly the commons further "Resolved: That all judges and magistrates are under the highest obligations to make diligent inquiry into all such wicked practices [specified in the preceding resolution], and do their utmost endeavours to discover and punish the authors of them; and such [magistrates] as wilfully neglect the same, ought to be looked upon as enemies to her majesty's government and the prosperity of this kingdom."<sup>52</sup>

Unhappily for the peace and comfort of the non-juring ministers, these violent resolutions were not inoperative. Though the injury intended by the first of them did not reach the seminary of Killiteagh, the two other resolutions so inflamed the zeal of the High-Churchmen of Belfast and its neighbourhood, that an informer was found to swear against Mr. M'Bride, before an Episcopalian minister, who was a magistrate; and a warrant having been taken out for his apprehension,<sup>53</sup> he was compelled, in the end of the year, to retire to Scotland, where he was forced to remain for above three years, though happily still employed in the work of the ministry. He resided in Glasgow, where he held the charge of one of the city churches,

and sat as a member of the established Presbytery of Glasgow. The indignation of the Episcopalian zealots was principally directed against Mr. M'Bride, not only from his occupying in Belfast a more prominent position than the other non-jurors, but perhaps, also, from his having escaped the penalties which they had hoped to bring down upon him in 1698, on account of his synodical sermon. His writings had annoyed them very much, and to these he had recently added another still more objectionable to their eyes. When the prosecutions against the ministers for celebrating marriage were at their height, he published anonymously an elaborate defence of their conduct in a pamphlet, the title of which may be given in full, as it furnishes an outline of the various topics discussed in it. He entitled it, "A Vindication of Marriage, as solemnised by Presbyterians in the north of Ireland. Wherein (1) their principles, practice, and reasons thereof are candidly shown, with the causes of their nonconformity to the form prescribed in the liturgy. (2.) The libels exhibited against ministers and people in the official [i.e., ecclesiastical] courts are examined and answered. (3.) And such marriages proven to be agreeable to Scripture, light of nature, laws of nations, and customs of other reformed churches, and not inconsistent with the civil laws of this land; and, therefore, lawful, tho' not canonical. By a minister of the Gospel."<sup>54</sup> This work exhibits Mr. M'Bride's learning and talents in a very favourable light; but, on this now obsolete topic, it is unnecessary to enter into particulars. It called forth two replies from ministers of the Established Church, neither of which, however, was published till a couple of years after its appearance. The first of these was published anonymously, but it was well known to have been written by the Rev. Ralph Lambert, D.D., who afterwards became chaplain to Lord Wharton, when lord-lieutenant, and under his patronage was made dean of Down, whence he rose to be bishop of Dromore, and ultimately of Meath. It appeared under this title, "An Answer to a late Pamphlet, entitled, 'A Vindication of Marriage, as solemnised by Presbyterians in the north of Ireland.'"<sup>55</sup> He pleads strenuously for depriving Presbyterian ministers of all power to celebrate marriage, and treats his opponent's arguments in a very flippant and contemptuous manner. Mr. M'Bride was next attacked by a former opponent of his, the Rev. Edward Synge, who does not seem to have been aware that he was encountering the same person to whom he had once before replied, in his "Defence of his Peaceable and Friendly Address to the Nonconformist."<sup>56</sup> Mr. Synge entitled his work, "A Defence of the Established Church and Laws."<sup>57</sup> Being chaplain to the lord-lieutenant, the Duke of Ormond, he dedicates it to his patron, and he published it early in the year 1705. He treats his unknown opponent with more respect and less arrogance than Dr. Lambert, while his defence of the exclusive right of the Established Church to solemnise marriage is much more effective than his.

A case of discipline, arising out of the marriage of a Presbyterian minister, which also came before the bishops' court, was likely, at this crisis, to endanger the liberties of church judicatories. The Rev. William Gray, minister of Taughboyne, between Raphoe and Derry, was charged with having been clandestinely, and, therefore, irregularly married, some time previously. The complaint was brought by his Presbytery before the Synod, in 1706, and a committee was appointed to meet at Strabane, in the month of July, to investigate the charge. Several persons were cited in the usual form, as witnesses, but care had been taken that no member of the Established Church was summoned to give evidence. This proceeding was reported to the judge of assize on the summer circuit, who took occasion to denounce it from the bench in severe terms, as an exercise of foreign jurisdiction expressly prohibited by law. He charged the grand jury to prosecute all such illegal meetings as dared to summon before them any of the Queen's subjects ; and, at the same time, declared that the members of that synodical committee would be forthwith called up to Dublin by the lords-justices, to answer for their breach of the law. This, threat, however, was not executed. Whatever may have been the prejudices of the Irish government against the Presbyterians, the administration in England were at this time disposed to protect them as far as lay in their power, and, wherever they could do so with effect, to restrain the High Church party from prosecuting Presbyterians on mere points of nonconformity.<sup>58</sup>

While parliamentary resolutions and Episcopalian pamphlets, assisted by overzealous judges, were thus stirring up strife and ill-will, the Church was steadily devoting her energies both to the defence and the propagation of evangelical truth. The former of these objects she endeavoured to secure by a law enacted by the Synod, in 1705, to the effect that all persons, licensed or ordained, should be required to subscribe the Westminster Confession of Faith, as the confession of their faith. The latter object she resolved to promote by the institution of a missionary fund for the support of infant congregations in the south and west of the kingdom. At this date, the Presbyterians in Galway, Dundalk, and Athlone,

<sup>58</sup> Wodrow's MS. Letters, vol. vi., No. 59. Mr. M'Cracken, writing to Wodrow, in October, 1704, furnishes an unequivocal proof of the tolerant spirit of the English administration. The High Church party, he says, "are as much embittered as ever, but are some way kept in. An instance is this : the bishop of Kildare had excommunicated one Mr. Persons for preaching, and was proceeding against him to have had him taken. But some sent a representation of it to England, and there came a letter discharging him to trouble any upon the account of nonconformity ; and so that is at an end."—Ibid, vol. ii., No. 76. were already looking to the Synod of Ulster for ministers to visit and take charge of them as congregations, as well as for aid towards the support of a permanent ministry among them. To meet the necessities of these scattered and neglected members of their communion, the Synod, in the year 1706, appointed a number of laymen<sup>59</sup> and ministers in each presbytery to solicit subscriptions throughout Ulster. These gentlemen collected about one hundred and ten pounds, as reported

<sup>59</sup> The names of these laymen are worthy of being preserved, as they were doubtless among the most zealous and active members of the Presbyterian community, and as they indicate some of the principal families at this period connected with the Church. In Down Presbytery, the gentlemen appointed were CAPTAIN STEVENSON, who was of Killileagh, and JOHN BLACKWOOD, who was of Ballyleidy, in the county of Down. It is singular to find these two gentlemen mentioned together, for, from the intermarriage of the son of the latter with the only daughter of the former, has sprung the family of the present Lord Dufferin. In Belfast Presbytery were Mr. UPTON and Mr. EDMONSTONE, both mentioned in this chapter, Note 42, Mr. ARTHUR MAXWELL, who was of Drumbeg, near Lisburn, a gentleman of great liberality, who, in his will, dated in 1720, bequeathed the munificent sum of £1300, the interest of which was to be applied to aid newly-erected congregations in the north of Ireland in the support of their ministers, and the surplus, if any, to assist in educating poor students for the Presbyterian ministry. What has become of this fund I have not been able to discover. Mr. DALWAY, the ancestor of the present family of Bellahill, near Carrickfergus, a family long distinguished for their ardent attachment to the Presbyterian Church, and Mr. HENRY CHADS, one of the first merchants in Belfast. In Antrim Presbytery were CAPTAIN SHAW, of the Bush, near Antrim, and Mr. JOHN SHAW, of Ballygelly, near Larne. In Convey Presbytery were CAPTAIN HENDERSON, of Castletown, near Strabane, and Mr. MORTIMER of Ramelton. In Armagh Presbytery was CAPTAIN HUGH MOORE, an elder in the congregation of Moira. In Coleraine Presbytery were COLONEL HAMILTON, a member of the Dunneenah family, and settled at Mount Hamilton, about half way between Ballymena and Ballymoney; CAPTAIN GALLAND, of Vow, in the parish of Finvoy;* Mr. HEYLAND, of Coleraine, ancestor of the Heylands of Glendarragh, near Cromlin, and Mr. JOHN THOMSON, who was also of Coleraine, and a member of its corporation. In Tyrone Presbytery were Mr. ANDREW STEWART, the ancestor of the present Lord Castlestewart, and Mr. WILLIAM CUNNINGHAM, mentioned in Note 42 of this chapter. And in Monaghan Presbytery were Mr. CAIRNS, of Monaghan, and Mr. CAIRNS, of Augher, in the county of Tyrone, ancestor of the Cairns of Killyfaddy. I may add that, so far as I have been able to learn, not a single representative of these families is now a member of the Presbyterian Church. [Some of the posterity of Captain Henderson, mentioned in the preceding note, are at present among the most respectable members of the Irish Presbyterian Church. One of his daughters married the Rev. Francis Laird, minister of Donoughmore, near Strabane, and among the descendants of this couple are the Rev. Wm. McClure, of Londonderry; his brother, Thomas McClure, Esq., J.P., D.L.; the family of the late Wm. Thomson, Esq., of Fountanville, Belfast; William Laird Finlay, Esq., Belfast, and his brother, Charles Finlay, Esq.]

to the next Synod; and with this sum, which was likely to be increased in subsequent years, missionary operations were commenced. Ministers were statedly sent to visit isolated societies of Presbyterians in remote parts of the kingdom, and in a short time the Synod was engaged, not only in organising congregations in the towns already mentioned, Galway, Dundalk, and Athlone, but were also supplying with ordinances the Presbyterians in Belturbet, Aughmacart, Drogheda, Edenderry, Summerhill, and other places.

While the Synod was thus extending the blessings of a stated ministry to the scattered members of their Church remote from Ulster, events in England were hastening the return of their friends to power. The elections for members of parliament in the summer of 1705 exhibited a decided majority throughout England for the Whig party; and, from the time that the new parliament met, in the end of October, they rapidly regained possession of the government. The first effect of this change which was felt in Ireland was the removal of the Duke of Ormond from the lord-lieutenancy, and the appointment of lords-justices. In the end of April, 1707, the Earl of Pembroke was prevailed upon to undertake the government of Ireland, and, on the 14th of June following, he arrived in Dublin, and was sworn into office. The appointment of this nobleman, the well-known friend of toleration, was hailed by the Presbyterians as encouraging a hope that the ignominious disqualification created by the Sacramental Test might be abolished. So far as his excellency and the administration which he represented were concerned, this hope would not have been disappointed, as it was one of his instructions to endeavour to effect the repeal or modification of that obnoxious and impolitic law. Accordingly, when he opened the session of the Irish Parliament on the 7th of July, he gave a significant indication of the wishes of the Queen and her ministers in these words, "I am commanded by her Majesty to recommend to you unanimity among yourselves, and to inform you that her Majesty, considering the number of Papists in this realm, would be glad of any expedient for the strengthening the interest of her Protestant subjects in this kingdom."<sup>60</sup> But the influence of the High Church party, who, just in proportion as their bigotry had been gratified, were becoming every year more inflamed against the Presbyterians, was too powerful to permit any alteration of the law in their favour. It is stated in a pamphlet called forth by a subsequent attempt to repeal the test, that the friends of the Presbyterians in the commons moved for an address to the Queen, to the effect, "that the house would accept of an expedient from her Majesty," which might unite the Irish Protestants in her service, and that this motion was rejected.<sup>61</sup> No trace of such a motion, nor, indeed, of any motion connected with the test, appears on the journals of the commons during this session. But, on the last day of July, when the government submitted a draft of the customary address to the Queen in reply to the opening speech of the lord-lieutenant, several divisions took place thereon, when an entire paragraph, which probably contained a proposal to the effect stated in the pamphlet referred to, was struck out by a majority of ninety-three against seventy-three. This adverse vote, or some other circumstance, appears to have convinced the government that any alteration in the operation of the Sacramental Test for this session was altogether hopeless. The secretary for Ireland, writing to an official of the administration in London, a few days after this division, thus describes the state of parties in the commons:<sup>62</sup>—

<sup>61</sup> See "A Narrative of the several attempts which the Dissenters of Ireland have made for a Repeal of the Sacramental Test." This was the second of Dean Swift's tracts in favour of the Test Act, according to Sir Walter Scott's arrangement; but though the Dean had access to the best sources of information, his "Narrative" is very confused and inaccurate. As it now stands, it did not appear until the year 1731, but Sir Walter states that it was first published in a periodical called the "Correspondent." This, however, is a mistake. That paper did not appear till 1731, whereas the early portion of the "Narrative" must have been published before the year 1715, because I find the greater part of it, word for word, in Tisdall's "Case of the Sacramental Test, stated and argued," (preface, pp. 4-13), which appeared in that year.

 “As to the other grand affair, I mean the taking off the Sacramental Test, it was impracticable in this house, and will ever be so as long as this parliament continues, which is made up of two-thirds of as High-Churchmen as any in England. You would hardly believe there should be such a creature as an Irish Protestant Jacobite; and yet ’tis most certain there are a great many such monsters. I forbear to enlarge any farther on these unaccountable productions; but if it be my fortune to see you next winter, I will tell you and prove it, too, that this country is very near as much under the power and influence of the clergy as the people of Italy are. And if care be not taken of them, in a short time they will put what measures they please on the civil power.” And a few days after, in a letter to the same correspondent, he expresses a similar opinion, and extends it to the House of Lords. “I entirely agree with you that nothing less than the taking off the Sacramental Test can remedy the growing evils this country labours under. But unless the government will call a new parliament, and sincerely espouse the taking it off, it will not be done. Two-thirds of the members of this present House of Commons are as high-fliers as Manly Ward, Byerly, &c. And in the other house, the bishops (every man of them) are as high as Laud was, and have so great an influence on the temporal lords (most of whom have as little sense as the Lord Abercorn), that they are at least six to one against the honest lords.”

<sup>62</sup> Letter from Mr. George Doddington to Mr. Hopkins, dated August 14, 1707, in the State Paper Office, London. Mr. Doddington had accompanied Lord Pembroke to Ireland; He was elected member for the borough of Charlemont in the previous month, and is styled in the “Journals” Mr. Secretary Doddington. It appears from this letter that the repeal of the test was specially given in charge to Lord Pembroke, and that some trial of strength had occurred between the parties just before this letter was written, in which the government were defeated. Hence the secretary’s warmth of indignation against the High Church party, as evinced in this and the next letter, quoted in the text, also taken from the original in the State Paper Office.

At the close of the session, the commons found another opportunity of displaying their zeal for upholding the test with even increased rigour. Hitherto, with the exception of Derry, the Presbyterian members of the several corporations in Ulster continued to hold their municipal offices, though they had ceased to act since the passing of the test, their Episcopalian brethren being reluctant to dispossess them by new elections. An inquiry having been instituted by the House of Commons into a disputed election by the corporation of Belfast of a member of parliament for the borough, it was discovered that the majority of the burgesses had ceased to act on account of their not having received the sacrament in the Episcopal Church. This was too tempting an opportunity for aiming another blow at the Presbyterians to be neglected by a House of Commons such as the present one was. They dexterously availed themselves of this case to impose such an interpretation on the Sacramental Test clause, as to render compulsory what had been considered only as optional, and to have it declared that the office of burgess was vacated in every case in which the occupant had not qualified by becoming a Conformist. A resolution to this effect having been proposed to the house, the previous question was moved by the Whigs ; but, though supported by all the influence of the government, it was carried against them by a majority of sixty-five to fifty-three.<sup>63</sup> This division occurred on the 28th of October, the session was closed on the 30th, and on the 2nd of November, Mr. Secretary Doddington gave the following account of this affair to the Earl of Sunderland :—"The Tories have, in this last meeting of parliament, made a great battle about a town called Belfast, in which place we brought in Mr. Ogle in opposition to one Mr. Cairns,<sup>64</sup> Mr. Gold's, of London, his brother-in-law. In the examination of the merits of that election, it appeared several burgesses, being Dissenters, had not taken the sacrament, &c., nor acted for some years past. Our antagonists brought that on again as to the matter of burgesses being qualified, and carried two resolutions, and they now give out that this will be a rule for purging all the corporations of Ireland. I have sent for and discoursed the leading Dissenters of Belfast, and pressed them to qualify themselves. And they give me great hopes they will comply, and promise to exhort all their brethren in the north to do the same.”<sup>65</sup> These hopes, that the Belfast Presbyterians would adopt the latitudinarian principles of occasional conformity, in order to preserve their offices, do not appear to have been realised. For, immediately after this resolution of the commons, the Presbyterian burgesses were superseded by the election of Episcopalians in their room—a procedure which was now sought to be extended to all the other corporatious in Ulster. This rigorous interpretation of the act was, of course, highly pleasing to Archbishop King, who, in a letter to his former correspondent, Mr. Southwell, on the 8th of November, thus relates the whole affair:—“The test got a parting blow, for on a disputed election for Belfast, it was found that only four burgesses out of thirteen were at the election; and on an inquiry, the reason was given that the other burgesses durst not act, having not taken the test. The question then came in very naturally, whether they were obliged to take it or not; and on a fair division, the house resolved that they were. This is looked on to be a fuller declaration of the sense of the house than all that happened before,<sup>66</sup> for they were under no necessity to make any such declaration [of conformity], and it was pressed hard, when it was very late, to adjourn the debate ; but on division they were resolved to go on with it, and made the aforesaid declaration."<sup>67</sup>

The impolicy of thus disqualifying nearly one half of the Protestants of Ireland from holding office under the crown, became apparent in the spring of the following year, when the French king made an attempt to land the Pretender in Scotland. Great alarm was felt throughout Ireland, but especially in Ulster, from its vicinity to Scotland, and an array of the militia took place for the defence of the kingdom. On this occasion many of the Presbyterians refused being enrolled, as bringing them under the operation of the Sacramental Test, and exposing them to its penalties if they did not conform. But though these scruples, which were well-founded in law, were not felt by others of the Presbyterian yeomanry of the province, enough had occurred to convince all moderate men of the impolicy of the law as it then stood. This conjuncture, therefore, was considered a favourable one for making another effort to obtain its repeal, and various circumstances encouraged the hope that it might be successfully attempted in England. Accordingly, the attorney-general for Ireland, Allan Brodrick, Esq., who was also speaker of the House of Commons, and the steady friend of toleration, visited England in the spring, and brought the matter before the government,<sup>68</sup> proposing that the clause in the Irish act against Popery should be repealed by an enactment of the English Parliament, as the oath of supremacy had been repealed in the previous reign. To promote this object, the ministers in Ulster drew up a congratulatory address to the Queen on the deliverance of the kingdom from the threatened invasion of the Pretender. In this address, after alluding to the loyalty of the Irish

Presbyterians to the crown during all the vicissitudes of the previous century, and expressing their satisfaction at the unsuccessful issue of the Pretender's project, they deemed it their duty respectfully to remind her majesty of the disqualifications under which they lay from the Sacramental Test. "We cannot, in conscience, neglect this opportunity of expressing our deep regret that the gentlemen and people of our persuasion are deprived of that capacity of serving your majesty and their country, which they so successfully improved on all former occasions, especially considering the present circumstances of this kingdom."<sup>69</sup> Congratulatory addresses of a similar import, lamenting the operation of the test, in disqualifying so many loyal Protestants from serving their country at this critical period, and hoping some expedient might be found for remedying this grievance, were presented to the Queen from a number of corporations, including even that of the metropolis.<sup>70</sup> The Presbyterians in Ulster also employed Counsellor Stevens, of Dublin, and despatched him to London to second the efforts of the attorney-general and other friends of their cause. But, the English Parliament having been recently dissolved, and the elections for the new one not yet completed, the government were not in a situation to hold out any hopes of being able to repeal or modify the Irish test in England. The business was necessarily deferred till the assembling of the new parliament in the end of the year. At that time the Whigs were found still to possess a decided preponderance; some further changes took place in the ministry, but no attempt was made by them to bring this Irish question before the English Parliament, probably having ascertained that the opposition to such a measure would be insurmountable. Lord Pembroke, having been appointed by the Queen Lord-High Admiral, in room of Prince George of Denmark, resigned the government of Ireland, and the Earl of Wharton, who had long been considered the leader of the Presbyterian interest in England,<sup>71</sup> was nominated lord-lieutenant in the beginning of December.

The appointment of this nobleman was highly gratifying to the Presbyterians, and inspired them with the hope that their grievances would now at length be redressed. At the same time, the High Church party were proportionably alarmed for the maintenance of the test—the precious bulwark of their ascendancy; and they again put forth every effort to prevent its removal. At this crisis a new and most powerful champion undertook its defence. This was no less a person than the celebrated Dean Swift, who, amid his political changes, was most steadfastly and most violently opposed to the claims of the Dissenters.<sup>72</sup> He now published, anonymously, the first of his well-known tracts in support of the Sacramental Test, entitled, “A Letter from a Member of the House of Commons in Ireland, to a Member of the House of Commons in England, concerning the Sacramental Test.”<sup>73</sup> In this pamphlet he employed all his unrivalled powers of sarcasm and irony to refute the claims of the Irish Presbyterians to relief from the test, and to denounce them as most formidable foes to the Established Church. He makes no scruple of avowing that more danger was to be apprehended from them than from the

<sup>73</sup> London, 1709, 4to, pp. 28. Though then in London, he dated it from Dublin, December 4, 1708. It appeared in the end of that month. See his letter to Archbishop King, in his “Works,” vol. xv., p. 292. Swift had thus been tempted to violate an early vow of his, never to write against the Presbyterians: “Pox on the Dissenters and Independents,” he wrote to the Rev. Dr. Tisdall, in 1704, “I would as soon trouble my head to write against a louse and a flea!”—Ibid., vol. xv., p. 255.

Romanists, whom he represents as in the fair way of being speedily extinct under the operation of the anti-popery laws. The following statement of their condition under those unrighteous laws, and the confident hope he expresses, which has been so signally disappointed, of their speedy conversion to the Established Church, will be read with painful interest by the present generation:—"We look upon the Papists to be altogether as inconsiderable as the women and children. Their lands are almost entirely taken from them, and they are rendered incapable of purchasing any more; and, for the little that remains, provision is made by the late Act against Popery that it will daily crumble away. To prevent which, some of the most considerable among them are already turned Protestants, and so, in all probability, will many more. Then, the popish priests are all registered, and without permission (which I hope will not be granted) they can have no successors; so that the Protestant clergy will find it perhaps no difficult matter to bring great numbers over to the Church; and, in the meantime, the common people, without leaders, without discipline, or natural courage, being little better than hewers of wood and drawers of water, are out of all capacity of doing any mischief, if they were ever so well inclined." On the other hand, he illustrates the danger to be apprehended from the Presbyterians, as contrasted with the Romanists, by this striking, but not very complimentary metaphor:—" 'Tis agreed among naturalists that a lion is a larger, a stronger, and more dangerous enemy than a cat. Yet if a man were to have his choice, either a lion at his foot, bound fast with three or four chains, his teeth drawn out, and his claws pared to the quick, or an angry cat in full liberty at his throat, he would take no long time to determine."

Scarcely had this clever and plausible pamphlet appeared, when another clerical controversialist, but of far inferior talent, hastened to attack the Presbyterians with the most offensive scurrility, and a total disregard of candour and of truth. This was the Rev. William Tisdall, D.D., the vicar of Belfast.<sup>74</sup> A few years previously, he had endeavoured, by a suit at law, to bring that town under the operation of the "Act for the provision of ministers in cities, corporate towns," &c.,<sup>75</sup> by which a heavy house-tax would have been imposed, in all time coming, on the inhabitants, in order to provide a higher salary for the legal incumbent. All parties in the town, whether Churchmen or Dissenters, resisted this illegal attempt; and the rapacious vicar was defeated by a judgment of the court of queen's bench, in the year 1706, which he in vain endeavoured to have reversed by the privy-council.<sup>76</sup> This mortifying result he was pleased to attribute to the influence of the Presbyterians, and from that period he became their implacable and unscrupulous assailant. His first publication against them was anonymous, and appeared in the spring of 1709, under this ironical title—"A Sample of True-blue Presbyterian Loyalty, in all changes and turns of Government, taken chiefly out of their most authentic records."<sup>77</sup> His professed object is to refute their claims to "untainted loyalty," put forth both in their address to the Queen in the previous year, and in De Foe's pamphlet, called "The Parallel," formerly mentioned; and by the grossest perversion of the facts and documents of history during the preceding century, he labours to prove them wholly unworthy of relief or toleration.

the end of April.<sup>78</sup> On the 5th of May he opened the parliament; and in his speech on that occasion, after alluding to the preponderance of the Romanist population over the Protestant, and urging still further severities against the former, he reminded both houses “of the necessity of cultivating and preserving a good understanding amongst all the Protestants of this kingdom:” and added, “What the most proper methods are to compass so desirable and so necessary an end, you yourselves who have the opportunities of knowing the uneasiness that any of your fellow-subjects may lie under, are fittest to judge.”<sup>79</sup> This obvious reference to a repeal, or, at least, a modification of the Test Act, was conveniently interpreted by the commons as a recommendation of a toleration act, which, so long as the test was unrepealed, the Presbyterians were not anxious to obtain. Accordingly, in their address to the lord-lieutenant, the commons willingly admitted the claims of the Presbyterians to receive ample toleration, “a liberty,” they say, “enjoyed by our most dangerous enemies;”<sup>80</sup> but they preserve a profound silence with regard to the Test Act, which they well knew was the only point referred to by his excellency. The House of Lords, in their address to Lord Wharton, would not consent even to offer toleration to the Presbyterians. In a house of only ten lay lords, but comprising no fewer than twelve bishops, headed by Archbishop King, always at his post to prevent any relief to Dissenters, they summarily rejected an amendment to that effect; and, in

<sup>78</sup> Lord Wharton brought over with him the celebrated Joseph Addison as his private secretary, but I do not find it stated in any of the biographies of this eminent writer that he was a member of the Irish House of Commons. Yet this was the fact: he was elected for the borough of Cavan, and took his seat on the 13th of May, 1709. His name occasionally appears on the Journals of the Commons during this, and more frequently during the subsequent session of 1710. In the autumn of that year, he returned with Lord Wharton to England, though his seat for Cavan was not vacated until the general election in 1713. I found several official letters of his, in his neat, lady-like handwriting, in the State Paper Office, London.

contempt of notorious facts, they boldly assured his excellency, that "all our fellow-subjects are treated with so much tenderness, that we hope they never will have just reason to complain of any uneasiness!"<sup>81</sup>

It was not to be expected that any modification of the test would be conceded during the session, which had opened so inauspiciously. The subject, indeed, does not appear to have been brought before the commons in any shape during the session. The house had very frequently under their consideration "heads of a bill for explaining and amending the act to prevent the further growth of Popery;" by one of the clauses<sup>82</sup> of which it was provided, that no convert from Romanism, nor, by implication, any other person, should be deemed in law a Protestant who had not taken the sacrament in the Episcopal Church.<sup>83</sup> But though the commons had frequent debates on this bill, in some of which the merits of the general question relative to the Sacramental Test may have been involved, no trace of any such discussion having taken place occurs on the journals of their proceedings; yet Swift, in one of his controversial pamphlets, asserts that an attempt was made in the commons to repeal the test during the government of Lord Wharton, and that it was defeated, "to the great confusion of the Presbyterians."<sup>84</sup> But however this may be, the lord-lieutenant appears to have been somewhat chagrined that his recommendation had not proved more effectual. In his speech at the close of the session, he once more called the attention of parliament to the subject of the

<sup>83</sup> There was another clause in this bill (sect. 23), which, two years afterwards, was productive of renewed trouble to the few non-juring ministers in Ulster. By it, any two justices of the peace were empowered to summon any persons above sixteen years of age to take the abjuration oath, and on refusal to commit them to prison, and inflict on them other severe penalties.

test in these pointed terms :—"I make no question but that you understand too well the true interest of the Protestant religion in this kingdom, not to endeavour to make all such Protestants as easy as you can, who are willing to contribute what they can to defend the whole against the common enemy." And having observed some symptoms in Ireland of that growing spirit of bitter hostility to Dissenters, which exploded in England a few months afterwards in the discourse of Sacheverell, he took occasion to warn all such bigots as sought to inflame the divisions among Irish Protestants of the impolicy of their conduct, and of the determination of the Queen and her ministers to protect the Presbyterians. "It is not the law now passed," said this enlightened governor, referring to the new anti-popery act to which he had just given the royal assent, "nor any law that the will of man can frame, will secure you against Popery, whilst you continue divided amongst yourselves; it being demonstrable, that unless there be a firm friendship and confidence among the Protestants of this kingdom, it is impossible for you either to be happy or to be safe. And I am directed to declare it to you as her majesty's fixed resolution, that as her majesty will always maintain and support the Church as by law established, so it is her royal will and intention that Dissenters shall not be prosecuted or molested in the exercise of their religion."<sup>85</sup>

Declaration of the Scottish army in Ireland.

Carrickfergus, 20 Feb. 1647

THE officers in this army considering how that after fyve yeares continowance in this service, the mouthes of many are opened against them intending to make them odious unto the parliament of England whereby they should not reape the rewaird of their labour ; or, by alleadging the disaffection of this army from the kingdome of England, strenthen what in them lyes the rebellious parties elsewhere : For prevention heirof and satisfaction of both kingdomes, the army have thought fitt to lay downe their proceidings thir fyve yeares bygone, that by their constant indeavour in advancing the service with continowed misrie and the rejection of all occasion whereby the kingdomes and service might be prejudgit, their faithfulness may be sufficientlie knowen and cleired to both kingdomes.

And first it is well knowen to all who have been in thir partes that dureing the tyme of doing service this army never continowed twentie dayes in thir quarters when they had bread to goe into the feeld, which was so sparinglie advanced unto us, as the enimie tooke occasion upon our marche to remove himself out of this province, till our provisions wer so spent, and so themselves free of our danger. And if there had beine bread, all other thinges wer kepted from us which ar requyred in the feeld. Notwithstanding we wer alwayes busied either in grosse or parties, till, by God's assistance and concurrence of the British, the rebellis wer banished this province. And since we came into this province the great members of this army were imployed elsewhere, which was no small prejudice to the service, and discouragement to other officers and souldiers; who being without head and command it could not be expected that vigorous prosecution to have ensued in other men's persones which was incumbent to these who kepted the places of honour in the army; seeing honour and reward ar the only spurres which lead men to undertake service, others commanding only by requeast.

And further, thir fyve yeares this army hath receaved but fyve moneths meanes; and so disenabled officers from living without taking themselves to servile offices; where officers of good qualitie and desert have beene some three or foure dayes without bread! —extremities, which have not been incident to any people except in beleaguered townes oppressed with famine; and this the people of the severall guarrisons will witness. As to the souldiers, no prisoners reserved for death in all Christendome have been at their wretched dyet: a pound of meale or a pound and a half at best, sometymes half a pound a day with twentie myles marcheing to and from an enimie; which weaknesse by continowed miseries might well be seen at Benbourb, when coming to push of pike they had no power to stand, but oppressed with weaknesse caused by famine dyed by the sword lyke withered reeds shaken by the winde for want of substance. Nor could it prove otherwayes, seeing that bread of affliction we gott was accompanied most tymes with the lamentable cryes of man, wyfe, and chylde preserved by God's great mercies from the bloodie enimie, and destroyed with hunger by us their covenanted brethren who wer sent for their relief, to the incredible grief of the commanders.

Notwithstanding all these extremities, when my Lord Ormond made that cessation with the Irish (upon what ground we know not) we sent to Scotland for resolution and advyce how to carry ourselves, but wer most parte left unto ourselvs, where we resolved joyntlie to continow as formerlie in opposition to the rebellis : And we believe in that juncture of affaires and tymes, it did much import the good and peace of both kingdomes ; the cessation being accepted by all the Brittish in this province, who feared that our necessities would enforce us to remove and leave them opposite to a powerfull enemie without all releef, which was verie probable, and we believed was the ground of their so doing. Certainlie if we had joyned in the acceptance thereof, the names of both kingdomes had beine forgott heir ere this, and perchance a more dangerous warre amongst themselves. Some moneths thereafter, our necessities wer so great, there being no provisions in store nor barne, and being enabled by act of committee in Scotland for transportation, we resolved to remove ; and sent some of our regiments unto Scotland, intending to goe with their boates when they wer returned. But the Estates of Scotland, knowing that by our removeall their peace should be troubled by the Irish, who had a designe to follow and so put the warre from home, they sent hither desyring the remnant of the regiments to forbear the removeall ; letting us understand what danger it would bring both to the cause and countrey, and promising to give us some assistance to subsist by, till the kingdome off England found meanes of giving us more reasonable supplies. So that thought wee found how much we would have bettered our fortunes and ourselces by that plentifull warre in England, we resolved to obey and stay in misrie expecting better, rather then to be thought the instrumentall causes of the evils which might ensue our going ; which the kingdom of Scotland promised with great acknowledgement ever to beare in mynd for the good of this army. And at that tyme some letters were sent to persones in this army from agents of the Catholick cause, perswading men unto their partie upon spacious and advantageous pretences ; which letters wer delivered by some of our number to my Lord Chancelour of Scotland : So fare wer wee from receaving impressions that way, although some men in that kingdome have taken occasion to speak larglie to the prejudice of this army as unwilling to help their countrie in extremities ; whereas we believe our willingnes was sufficientlie knowen to them who wer heir, although many reasons wer against it. For if we could have found the way in prosecution of that warre to be so well

payd as we might have undertaken it with expectation of success there was no privat interest should have hindered us from the undertaking. But wee thank God who hes helped them and hindered us from being the occasion to ruine this poore people who has done so much for our releef.

After Benbourb conflict, when the British sent by Culbreath [Galbraith], unto my Lord Ormond for his conjunction, which then was thought the only meanes to keepe lyfe in this bussinesse, some of our officers being at Belfast with the commissioners were desyred by the commissioners to signe that letter to Ormond, which we did; and thereafter my Lord Follart [Folliot] was sent thither to the same effect, and answer was returned in generall with some particular letters which the commissioners did peruse themselves, but sent not the public letter unto the officers. Whereupone their followed ane other letter from my Lord Ormond which the Generall-Major kept up with the commissioners advyce. But we, conceaving our owne interests and standing to be therein deeplie involved, desyred to see the letter; and thereafter at our meeting receaved ane letter from the commissioners (quhilk is still extant) intreating that the subject of debat at that tyme might be the sending of supplies to Ormond, who then was pressed by the rebell, and had sent unto the commissioners and army to that effect, But considering we had gotten no supplie from England since the comissioners came, and that by their coming the command of foote and horss was disjoynted, which made us as an prey unto the enemye, if the Lord miraculously had not prevented it by taking away their spirit and judgment from them. And becaus we thought their solicitations in England for us wer not soc reall as they professed, wanting all effect; which we conceive now to be by reasone of the jealousies then in hand betwixt both kingdomes, we resolved to send unto Dublin ourselves to know the condition of the business there, and what way our people might subsist if we sent them thither, and what securitie it would bring us in thir partes who wer already weak enough. And after our returne we conceived it unfitt to weaken ourselves so farrre, except the Brittish would proportionably assist, and my Lord Ormond give Tredagh [Drogheda] as ane place of suritie to us for our people. Whereupon we had no returne unto this day; and wee must profess ingenously that it was never motioned in publict to the army to joyne with Ormond to make up ane partie with the Irish ; nor in particular to any of us who could doe little themselves without the conjunction of the rest of the officers and sojourns, amongst whome we belive there is not one that will say it was ever mentioned unto him by any of this army or other whatsoever : so that they may be ashamed who doe abuse honest men's names for their owne base ends.

Now wee hope we have so plainly and sincearlie shewed our bygone carriage, sufferings, and indeavours for the service and interest of the kingdome of England ; as wee hope the not perfecting of this service will not be imputed unto us, but is ane miserable effect of this civill and unnaturall warre in both kingdomes, which hath averted the mynds of the kingdome of England from looking unto the bleeding condition of this people and army. But now wee expect the kingdome of England will consider of us with honorable mynds, as they ever dealt with their servants formerlie ; and give us some reasonable satisfaction for tymes past, being thereto obliged by treatie and covenant ; wherein the kingdome of England and Scotland are obliged respectivelie to maintaine all subjects in their properties and liberties. And we are confident the honorable houses of parliament of England will admitt no other thoughts then to give honest men their due reward, according to the command of God and man : for the not performing thereof might be a great discouragement to others if it please God to continow or renew this warre, and bring honest men to desperat resolutions.

Yet in hope of the honorable houses of Parliament their just and pious resolutions, wee pray for their peace and happiness.

Instructions to the Scottish Commissioners sent over to Ulster to induce the Scottish and British forces to join the Engagement.

[MSS. Bib. Jur., Edin. Trans. of the Scottish Army, fol. 164.]

Instructions to the Lord Cochrane, laird of Garthland, and Alexander Crawfuird.

Edinburgh 10th May 1648.

You shall with all diligence repair to Ireland and deliver our letters to Generall-Major Monro, and to the Lord Clanbasile, the Lord-Viscount Airds, Sir James Mantgomerie, Sir Robert Stewart, and remanent commanders of the Brittish forces there, according to the directions. You shall represent to them our just feares of the dangers to religion, his majesties royall persone and authoritie and monarchicall government in him and his posteritie, and the peace and happinesse of these kingdomes from the prevailing power of sectaries and their adherents in England. As lyke-ways that the seazing of Berwick and Carlile gives us just ground to apprehend the coming of the said army of sectaries towards our borders. Therefore we are desyrous to have such supplies and assistance from our army, and the Protestant British forces in Ireland as they can possibly afford us, either for securing ourselves against any invasion, or for carying on our necessarie dueties for religion, our king, and the peace and happinesse of his kingdomes. And for encouraging them to joyne with us in this service you are to offer to all who will engage with us, either of our own army there or the Brittish, ——— the half whereof you are to deliver to them in Ireland upon advertisement from us, and the other half at their landing.

You shall report to them our willingnesse to take an effectual course for provyding their guarrisons with meale, and supplicyng such of their souldiers with cloathes as shall be appointed to stay behind, after we shall be informed of the quantitie requisite.

You are to assuir them that dureing the tyme of their service in this warre, so many as shall be sent over shall be kept in equall footing with the army of this kingdome, according to their numbers both officers and souldiers.

When any transaction or treatie for peace whatsoever shall be made, you ar to assuir them that we shall be carefull that just satisfioun and assurances shall be given them from England for their arrears and long service in Ireland. And when their employment heir shall be at ane end, we will ingadge ourselves for provyding schipping and all other things necessarie for their transportation, and to make upp their forces to the same number they shall bring over for our assistance.

You are to assuir the Brittish that, upon their engadging with us, we shall be willing and readie to give them the publict securitie of this kingdome for the safetic of their honours and estates from all prejudices that may come to them for their assisting us. And that their interests and arriers shall be as carefullie lookt unto in all transactions or treaties for peace, as those of this kingdome of Scotland.

You shall show them that when we shall know their owne desyres concerning their superior commanders, we shall be readie to give them all just satisfaction therein.

You shall desyre that such forces as shall be sent unto this kingdome, either from our owne army, or from the Brittish afoirsaid, may come furnished with all armes requisit; and in cace any others of the Protestant Brittish shall be willing also to engadge in this service, you shall assuir them for the lyke conditions.

Letter from Lieutenant-Colonel Wallace to the Rev. Robert Douglass, Moderator of the General Assembly.

Upon the suden and strange overturnings in England, we thought it heighe tyme for us to consider and seriouslie to deliberate upone whate should be fittest for us in these pairts of this

kingdome to doe ; and efter we had by prayer and supplicatione which was particularlie recommendit by the Presbetry, and after the debaitinge of all particullars and in specialle the conveniencies and inconveniencies of renueing of our former vowes in our covenant to God frome whome we had so deeplie revolted, we did unanimuslie agree in this, that our covenant should be renewed, and a representatione of the caradges of the sectarian pairtie in England in relation to religionne and government sett furth by the Presbitry for the peoples informatione. Thes things beinge matters of great consequence wer not propounded and concluded at one dyett, bot wer seriouslie thought upon by all the people of the Lord heire, and his mynd and directione to us, both in private and in publike, earnestlie begde. Neither have we to this day seene or observed anie thing in his providence wittenesseinge against us ; upon the contraire givinge us everie day moir and moir incouragement heirin and confirmations of his acceptinge of this our sacrifice at our hands. We think God in his righteous judgement hath soe plagued the polesies and, as some say, the prudentiall wayes of all men about this worke since the beginninge, that wee durst no moir consulte with flesh and bloode ; but haveinge the ground and fountaine of all our evils mad knowne unto us, and our ductie soe cleirly pointed out, wer constrained with boldnes and confidence chearfullie to stepe forward and tak upp Christ and his crosse in our airmes as the onlie meane even of our owne securitie.

The Covenant and Representation beinge both concluded upon by the Presbetry, they did send one of their number, by name Mr. Anthony Kennedie, to Collonel Monck, beinge at that tyme at Dundalk, desiring his concurrence with them ; his answer was the particullars demanded wer of such consequence that he would not answer them particularlie, till he should come to the quarters and advise with the two Lords Clanbrissell and Airds, and other officers of regiments and gentlemen of the cuntry. Hee came downe and against the day appointed the ministers went to Lis-negarvey where the meatinge was to receave his answeere, but found no satisfaction : Yett there was a secound meating appointed in that same place which was to be moir full. At this meatinge, did the officers of the airmy and the people frome the severall parishes of the cuntry, petitione the generall that he wold be pleased to grant the desires of the Presbyeterie, which wer that he should publiclie sign the Covenant himself, and give order to all under him to doe the like, and that he should declair publiclie against the sectariane pairtie in England as enemies to the covenant, and likways to restrain the bringing in of any moir Irishes upon protections ; and the puttinge of the cuntrie in a poustour of warr for their securitie frome all enemies within and without the kingdoms. But after they had spent a longe tyme their, they returned all unsatisfied in any one particularre : whereupone their was a meeting appointed at Newtoun by the officers of the army and gentlemen of the cuntrie to consider upon what was next to be done. At this meating it was thoght necessarie that sin cewe had unanimuslie taken the Covenant and so had declaired ourselves enemies to the now prevailling pairtie in England, that we should unitte ourselves firmlie in a formall and regular way for maintenance of what we had done ; whereupon there was another dyete appointed at Cumber. Bot before our pairtinge at Newtoun wee sent a commissioner againe to Coll. Monck renewing our former desires.

Now all this tyme is there post efter post sent away to England to certifie of our cariage, and to require speedie supplie. At Cumber there was one sent to Coll. Monck desiringe a personall treatie with him ; and in the meantyme letters wreatin for ane accompt of all the able horsemen and airmes that were in the cuntrie. Collonel Monck granted the personall treatie at Belfast upon assurance of his saife returne, which he demanded and was granted. At that dyete was the Declairation and Propositions of the airmy and cuntrie signed by both. All that past at that meatinge you will perceave by the inclosed, and by what I sent to my Lord Argyle. The result of this meatinge was the giving of him a new dyette, at the which he promiseist to give his finall answer whether he wold joyne with us or not. When that dyete came, which was upon Munday last, wee had nothing from him bot a desire of a new delay and a promise of good neighbourhood howsoever maters goe. This was frome Dundalk where he is and liklie shall be, till the forces longed for by Collonel Jones and him doth come ; whoe, as wee ar certainlie informed and not denyed by sune of themselves, ar to have the chiefe command, the one as lieutenant-generall the other as generall-major of the sectaries forces in this kingdome.

betwixt us and Coll. Monck, and sumthing of a representation of our estate. Ther is non in thes pairts, except Papists, that have not taken the Covenant, even all the Englishe under Monck's command. It is likwayes taken most cheirfullie about the Derrie, and we and they ar unite in one, soe that we ar no mor two bot one : they have beene verie much trobled pairtly by mallignants, pairtly by sectaries, I mean Sir Charles Coutts and thes within Derrie. But God who is wise in counsell, and knoweth how to delyver His own out of tentation, hath upon Setterday last caused the sectarie to fall out upon the mallignant, and baite him to peaces. Thair was at least kilt and taken prissoners nyn or ten, the onlie active men of the mallignant pairtie. Now the honest pairtie ar lyen down close about the Derrie ; it is not liklie that they can carrie it as long as they have vittualls, which we hope shall not be longe. We ar now in greatest fear of my Lord Ormond, who in effect hes the most pairt of this kingdome at his command. Thus you have by this and by the papers I sent this last week to my Lord Argyle, a perfyte accompt of the conditi-one of the affaires heir, wherof wee defer your censure and judgments upon a through examination of all ; as likwayes your advice to us your brethren in relatione to the advancement of the publike worke, and our own and your securitie and saiftie.
 From your servant,

J. W.

Account of the death and dying words of Major Edmond Ellis.

[MSS. Bibl. Jurid., Edin., Rob. iii., 2, 16., No. 18.]

The words of that worthie and faithful professor of the Gospel, Major Edmund Ellis, on his death-bed a little before his last breathing, in the hearing of Christians who came to visit him ; the day being the eleventh of Junii, being the day after the offering of the Engagement at Antrim to the parishes thereabout, and to Templepatrick and Belliclare. [A.D. 1651.]

On the Lord's day, being the 8th of June at night, after he had spent the day faithfully in his family, his sickness began to work upon him, which he and others with him did conceive to be the second sickness which formerly he had about fifteen weeks before, and was then near unto death; and that was called by the doctors a collick, contracted by choller and melancholy, which continued untill the day of his death being the Wednesday. In the morning he rose, but being exceeding faint, partly by the anguish of the sickness itself, and partly by the operation of the physick which he had taken the day before, he said to his daughter Langford who come to see him, "What made you rise so soon? As for me, I feel no more paine than you have." Yet a little while after his wife came to him and told him that death was working with him, and that the signes of it was evident by the great coldness of his legs, arms, and hands; upon which words he also apprehended death to himself, and after that never doubted of it. Then he sent for diverse of his friends; in all his discourse he spake like a dying man, mortifying to this present world, and languishing much for communion with the Lord.

At first he was something doubting concerning his own salvation, expressing himself thus to a friend, that he could not now get any thing particularly to gripp on, except one general promise, 1 Tim. i. 15; after that he left off doubting, repeating that text before his friends and saying, "I declare unto you that I have nothing in myself to lean on, but all depends on his free mercy; that is the only life I live on." Likewise this promise he fastened on, Isa, xlv. 22, "I see here," says he, "that a look is taken for faith." Being asked what he thought of this present way and power that soe many are following, and have turned from their former principles, even to the persecuting of that which they formerly avowed? He answered very gravely, with his eyes towards heaven, which at that tyme was frequently his gesture, "the way that is now persecuted in the land I declare to be the old way and the way that leads unto life, the way that I found God in. Men are but seeking vanity in that new way. I doe not now fear the sectaries, though I have often feared this tryall of the engagement, and now I have gotten a deliverance.' He said likewise that neither sectaries nor malignants should carrie it; this he spake oftener than once or twice. He gave also warning concerning the engagement, speaking particularly thereof to me, saying "Beware of the engagement, be faithful and exemplaire to the people about you." When his friends about him were all weeping he said to them, "Weep not ; goe apart to pray for me, and lend me a lift." He said to his wife and others who were in their dutie about him, leaving nothing undone that they thought for his good for the preserving his life if it had been possible, while they were offering him some cordiall, "Doe not stay me—O do not stay me !"

He took his leave solemnly of his whole family and others about him, speaking severally apart to them all. He began with his wife, and desyring her to speak of the sweet and comfortable fellowship that was betwixt them since their marriage. "We have been," says he, "now these seven years married, and there was never a contradictory word betwixt us;" and having exhorted her refreshingly, gravelie, and piouslie, he prayed God to strengthen her under the present burden. And speaking to them about him he said, "Help this poor woman to bear the cross ; there is nothing that pities me in my departure, but the condition of my poor wife." Among other particulars he desyred her to doe him the last duty with her own hands, to wit, to wind him herself. Upon which words, as there was no marvell, she fell a weeping 'more heavilie, we cannot say bitterlie, but as one wounded deeplie in affection. Whereupon he replied to her, "I have been these seven years with you, but ye never angered me till now."

Next he spoke to his mother ; "Dear mother, make sure work of your salvation ; I have been often convinced, though I have been speaking to you, that I was not faithful as I ought." To his daughter Langford, "I am confident that you have begun already. Hold on ; I have been speaking to you some times and praying for you." To his son, Mr. Upton, "Arthur, you are but young, seek unto God. I have been many times desyring you and praying for you. I had once the possession of all you are to enter to, and I was steward to it a little while ; and you know not how long you may enjoy it ; therefore make sure your salvation." To his kinsman, Captain Welsh, "George, you have good knowledge, pray that it may be sanctified unto you, which is the only polishing of a man's endowments. Be frequent in prayer, and make sure your salvation ; death and life are before you." To his servants he spake and exhorted them concerning

Then he called for his daughter Susanna, being about two years old, and put his hand on her head and prayed that the Lord would bless her and train her up in his wayes, and make her His servant, and make good unto her that promise—I will be thy God and the God of thy seed. Also he said, “ I often prayed for her both before she was born and since.” To a friend, “ Ye have begun to be faithfull ; study every day to be more faithfull ; and shrink not from one hair-broad of the truth for all the hazard and difficulties ye may meet with ; study to strengthen others.” To Mrs. Kennedy, “ Study to mortification, and be helpfull to your husband in his duty ; that you may be comfortable to him in his present condition.” To Mr. Jeremy O’Quin he said, “ Mr. Jeremy, ye have not been soe faithfull for Christ as ye should have been ; study to more faithfulness. You have begun in the spirit, but its to be feared ye end in the flesh ; I mean your conniving too much with this present power. Stand fast and be faithfull,” with some more speeches to that effect. To Peter Saron, “ Peter, you and I have been often together, death and life now is not jesting, neither this that I am now going in possession of ; I received the arles [earnest] many tymes at the communions at Holywood.” To Mr. Shaw, “ Mr. Shaw, I am glad to have seen you ; I will take my leave of you : outward profession will not doe the turn ; life and death are no jesting matter.”

He desired a friend to speak to his brother Clotworthy, his brother Captain Ellis, and to Captain Langford : “ Tell them in my name that they make sure their salvation ; and as they have begun to give a testimony unto the truth, that they will continue.” Afterwards he spoke these same words, he took leave with my Lady Clotworthy, and Mrs. Clotworthy, having likewise spoken unto them gravellie and piouslie, as they had received Christ soe to walk in him ; and being asked if he would drink, he answered, “ I hope shortly to drink of that new wine in the kingdom of heaven.” Also he said frequently to his wyfe and others in their bewailing, “ Ye will soon follow ; ye will soon follow.”

He went away very sweetly. He was in an agonie for a little tyme ; but he calmed mildlie, longing much for his dissolution and compleat union with the Lord. He said, “ Lord Jesus, come quickly. Take thou long steps for I have taken short." After that he said, "The bridegroom bids me welcome."

into Europe from the recently discovered mines in America, and in 1640 the value of gold and silver was reduced to about one-third of what it had been 120 years before. In 1655, wheat was unusually cheap, and yet it sold at from £1 5s. to £1 6s. per quarter. The average of the Windsor markets, from 1646 to 1655, was £2 11s. 7d. per quarter; and for the following decade, from 1656 to 1665, it was £2 10s. 5d. per quarter. These prices are not more than two or three shillings below the average from 1850 to 1860. (See Notes and Queries, vol. xi., 249, March 31, 1855.) About the same time, an ordinary labourer received for wages from sixpence to sevenpence per day. In 1610, the price of beef and mutton was from 3½d. to 3¾d. per pound. (Ibid.) In 1633, the prices of all kinds of poultry were nearly the same as at present. Taking all these items into account, we may not, perhaps, be far from the truth, if we reckon that £100 in 1655 was not equivalent in value to more than £300 in 1867. In Chap. VII., Note 17 (Vol. I., p. 311), Dr. Reid himself has deviated widely from his present estimate.]

* The following extracts from the Records of the Privy-Council is a further pleasing evidence that preaching in the Irish language was not neglected during the Protectorate:—"Dublin Castle, March, 3, 1656 [7]. Upon reading the report of Dr. Winter, Dr. Harrison, Mr. Wooton, and Mr. Chambers touching Mr. James Carey, and of his fitness and abilities to preach the Word both in English and Irish, and upon consideration had thereof, and of the usefulness of gifts in order to the conversion of the poore ignorant natives: It is thought fit and ordered, that the said Mr. Carey doe preach to the Irish at Bride's parish once every Lord's-day, and that he doe occasionally repair to Trym and Athy, to preach as aforesaid; and that for his care and pains therein he be allowed the sallary of sixty pounds per annum to be paid quarterly."

Address of the ministers assembled in Dublin to Henry Cromwell, Lord-Deputy, in May, 1658.

[Mus. Brit., MSS. Lansd. No. 1228, fol. 14.]

To his Excellency the Lord-Deputy General of Ireland.

The humble addresse of the ministers by authority assembled now at Dublin out of the several provinces of Ireland.

When we reflect on the Egyptian confusion from whence wee are ransomed, and the wilderness of difficulties through which wee are carryed to some present sight and expectation of settlement, wee dare not but blesse the Lord for his goodnes, and your excellency, in the name of the Lord, as an eminent instrument in his good hand of providence, entrusted with power, instructed with wisdom, inflamed with zeale to appeare for the Lord and His truth, His wayes and worship, His ministers and people. In generall for all the good you have done and that is in your heart to doe for the house of our God: In speciall, for the occasion and scope of this present convention and those many subservients to the glory of God and good of His people commanded us by your excellency: In particular, for empowering those honourable, wise, and religious personages to endeavour the settlement of our maintenance; wherein they have evidenced such diligence, prudence, and zeale for our office, that with thankfulness wee fully consent to their report, as to the modell and scope thereof in the generall. And, in all submission, wee doe become suitors that they may be engaged to compleat the same worke.

Though this one particuler (wherein your excellency acts as a "nursing-father" to the Church of Christ) engageth our duty to blesse the Lord for you, yet the other particulars commanded us by your excellency are as more sublime soe more engaging. The conversion of the Papists "from darkenes to light and from the power of Satan unto God; the healing of breaches that brethren fall not out by the way; the opening the fore-door of ordination and back-door of ejection; the planting truth by catechising, watering the truth planted by sacraments, and fencing both by discipline; the suppressing of heresy and prophanenes, and promoting of godlines (the summe of the first table), honesty (the summe of the second), and in order to both, the due observance of the fourth commandment in the sanctification of the Lord's-day, which is placed in the midst as a ligament to fasten the duties of both: "And all this to be done in the spirit of love and long-suffering, that all such as feare the Lord and desire to serve him in fayth and sobriety might knowe their liberty and see it secured; wee make bould herein to use these your excellency's own wordes as not being able to devise or desire better.

These high concernments your excellency was pleased to instance as the grand intendment of the present convention. 'Tis to us as life from the dead. Wee had formerly (almost) said—Ireland's grief is incurable! But blessed be the Lord, and your excellency in name of the Lord, for an harvest of joy in a day of griefe and desperate sorrow. For all which we humbly offer the returne of our thankfulness, duty and obedience; beseeching the Lord to guide, order, and blesse in soc great a service (for which who is sufficient?) the spiritts, debates, resolves, and endeavours of

Your excellencies most obliged, most reall, and most dutifull servants in the ministry of the Gospel:

Mrs. Goodall's Memoir of her husband's residence and imprisonment at Armagh. A.D. 1658—77.

[MSS. Bibl. Jurid., Edin., Jac. v. 7, 22.]

A little after my husband and I went to Ireland to dwell, the prelatie party began to thrust out the honest and faithful Presbyterian ministers, and to establish the prelates in their room and place. Our second son Sampson was baptised by Mr. Hope Sherid, minister of Armagh, where we dwelt, before he was put out of his church. Afterwards when faithful ministers had no liberty to preach publicly, Joseph, our third son, was baptized by Mr. Thomas Kennedy, minister of Dungannon. Our landlord, Sampson Thaker, desired my husband to baptize Joseph with the curate ; but he answered, "I do not belong to their Church, and therefore will have nothing ado with abjured prelates." After that we had two other children baptized with Presbyterian ministers.

They who would not comply with the prelates to hear curates or observe the King's birth-day, Christmas-day, or other superstitious days which they appointed, such persons were warned to the bishop's official court ; and when they appeared at the court every man paid a groat, and was not called in question for any thing, until the next year after that they paid a groat at the same court again. But my husband would not answer any of their courts, nor pay them anything at all. And when Mr. Thaker pleaded earnestly with him to go to the church, desiring him only to go in and come presently out again ; and when he refused that, he having a concerned care to excuse my husband at the prelates' hands, he desired him only to come into the entry without the church-door, that he might say he saw him there and satisfy the prelates with that account. But my husband refused that also, and would not make any show or appearance of complying with them in anything, for he durst not in conscience mock God and deceive man at that rate. The prelates were so enraged at my husband's zeal that they proceeded against him with the censures of their kirk, when they could not prevail with him neither with their promises nor threatenings. So they excommunicated my husband and other eighteen of the professors of the parish of Armagh, because they came not such a full length as they would have had them, although they answered their courts. Mr. Peden told my husband that by the prelatic excommunication "he was casten out of the devil's count-book."

In process of time the prelates proceeded to greater rigour, and imposed the oath of supremacy upon the people, whereby they made the King the head of the Church, which very few of the professors complied not with except my husband and his brother and some others. My husband's brother said to my husband when they were discoursing of that sacrilegious supremacy, "that it seemed they were of the mind to make a god of that man." My husband continued three years giving testimony against all their superstitions. The behaviour of the most part of the professors dwelling in the country did not come so much under the view and observation of the prelatic party as my husband did, because he dwelt in the town, and some of the most considerable persons of the clergy passed by my husband's door as they went to the church and as they came from it, for it was just in their way ; and when they came by [on holidays] he was then sure to make most noise at his work, which made them account him contumacious. However he regarded not their displeasure for his keeping a good conscience.

He desired an honest man who had his horse a grazing in the country to send him in the horse because he wanted sand ; and the man sent in the horse on Christmas-day, not minding what a day it was ; and when the horse came he yoked him with a sled that same day and sent a man with him who brought him two sledfulls of sand. Both Papists and prelates have such a respect for that day that few will adventure to work on Christmas-day. The honest man was greatly molested that brought the sand ; but being an old man, they dealt not so rudely with him as they would have done otherwise. However this so incensed the prelates against my husband that one of the chief men of the town, called Captain Cope, who was son-in-law to the dean of their church, said that he cared not for eating until he got amends of Mr. Goodall. He could not eat his dinner peaceably without venting his anger against my husband. So he and some others employed a curate* to go to Dublin the metropolis of Ireland, for a warrant to apprehend my husband and put him in prison. The curate went to Dublin, which was three score miles distant from Armagh, and laid down five pounds sterling upon the green table unto such as had power to give the warrant which they call a "capias," with which he came to the sheriff of Armagh, and at the sheriff's door was in such haste to have my husband apprehended he would needs continue on horseback ; and so bowing himself down to whisper into the sheriff's ear that he had got a "capias," and had there two officers with him to apprehend Mr. Goodall, his horse gave him such a knock upon the breast that he cried out he had gotten his death-stroke, and presently he had such a conviction of the iniquity of the business he was about that he said, " this will not do, this work will not work ;" and acknowledged it was for Mr. Goodall's sake he had gotten his dead-stroke.

* By a note at the end of the MS., it appears that this person was Mr. Peper, "curate at Loughgall, four miles from Armagh."

However, the officers are sent for my husband, and coming into our house to the fire-side, (where my husband was sitting with Mr. Maxwell, the Laird of Moncrieff in Galloway, who was but newly come to visit us,) said to him, "Mr. Goodall, you are the king's prisoner." My husband went hastily with them, and whispered into my ear, "My dear, dispatch Mr. Maxwell out of our house lest he be sent for next!" So my husband was imprisoned, and Mr. Maxwell got safely escaped into the country.* But the curate went home and immediately took his bed, and fell into a raging fever and raved continually, and scarce spake a sensible word till he died, excepting only that he commanded his wife expressly not to exact the five pounds steeling from husband, nor to put him to it at all; which by their law he was obliged to pay when he was liberated out of prison: And this his wife faithfully promised to do and performed it likewise; and when she came to my husband she sadly regretted her husband's having any hand in his imprisonment. When the sheriff went in to write the warrant (for besides the "capias" they behoved to have the sheriff's warrant) the curate told the two officers that his horse's head had given him his dead-stroke, &c. So when he got the sheriff's warrant he came presently riding to Armagh, with the two officers, and apprehended my husband and put him in prison. He kept the matter so secret that he could not first ride home to his own house, which was four miles from Armagh, lest any should have got intelligence of his design, who would have warned my husband to have gone out of the way. My husband was so well beloved that if any of his neighbours had known it, they would have told it to my husband. Well, the curate went home, and in his raging fever died within a fortnight. In his raving he would have said, "I am primate of Armagh, now I will take Mr. Goodall out of prison." It was remarkable that his

* This person was Mr. John Maxwell, the younger, of Monreith. He had been at the battle of Pentland, for which his property was forfeited and himself outlawed: and in 1667 he took refuge in Ireland, in company with Mr. James Kirko, of Sundaywell, in Dumfrieshire, and the Rev. Gabriel Semple, the ejected minister of Kirkpatrick-Durham, in the Presbytery of Dumfries. (M'Crie's "Memoirs of Veitch," pp. 49, 400.) Mr. Semple, in his "Memoirs," an unpublished MS. in possession of the Rev. Dr. Lee, Edinburgh, gives (p. 49) the following brief account of their visit to Ireland:—"A year after Pentland, I went to Ireland with worthy Monerieff and Sundaywell, two as serious, tender, and public-spirited Christians as I have known. Monerieff died there of a tympany [dropsy]. I was with him at Dublin where he first took his distemper, and in the north when he came to Benburb, where Mr. Archibald Hamilton lived, where he died. The ministers and professors in Ireland were very kind to the exiled from Scotland."

The gentlewoman, Mrs Oath, who kept the prison, was a widow, yet had such respect to my husband, that when a rich citizen of Armagh offered her a bond to let Mr. Goodall go lie at his own house, she said she preferred Mr. Goodall's own word to any bond whatsoever, and would have no bond but his own word ; and so she suffered him to go home at night and lie in his own house ; and for the fashion for a few days sent a man with him at night and for him in the morning. And that night our ordinary place of singing happened to be in the 109th psalm, verse 6th, my husband and I had such a lively frame of spirit in the time of the singing of the psalm, that we both marvelled at it, but understood not what it meant ; until within a day or two after, when we heard that the curate was deadly sick of a raging fever, so we understood it to be applicable to him ; and when we were told of the curate's sickness we both protested that we blessed the Lord we had no prejudice or ill-will against his person. All the while my husband was in prison he did not lie a night out of his own house except only two, and he was in prison three years and six weeks. He was like a Joseph in the prison, the gentlewoman the gaoler was admirably favourable and discreet to him ; for when he got notice of a sermon or a sacrament that was to be ten or twelve miles, or however far from Armagh, when he had said, "Mrs. Oath, I am going to a sermon some miles," he had full liberty from her. Now, ministers durst neither preach nor give communion in the day-time, but in the night ; and people then found no hurt by wanting their sleep at such occasions. One day, when my husband was riding with his brother and some others to a sermon six miles from Armagh, a friend of Mr. Cope's met him, and attempted to bring him back prisoner, in order to affront Mrs. Oath, the gaoler. But he being defeated in that design, went to the sheriff and reported he saw my husband on horseback. Whereupon the sheriff came to Armagh to examine Mrs. Oath ; but she courageously defended herself thus, "None have anything to say to me for managing my prisoner, if I, when any court calls for Mr. Goodall, can present him before them ;" which she said she was sure she could do with her prisoner. So the sheriff could not thrust her out of her charge.

There were also five* Presbyterian ministers imprisoned at Dublin, where they continued five years prisoners, but were at last liberated by an order from the King, which Sir Arthur Forbes, deputy of Ireland, procured them. Two of these ministers, who were taken in Lifford in Ireland because they would not desist from preaching—when they returned home passing through the town of Armagh, and hearing that my husband was in prison, they visited him; and one of them, Mr. Hart, told him he was to go to Dublin the next summer, which was half-a-year after that day, and would speak to Sir Arthur Forbes to procure a liberty for him also; which he did according to his promise, and when the deputy went to London he brought an order from the King to get all out of prison that were imprisoned on the account of religion. There were none in prison in Ireland at that time for religion but my husband and another honest man in the county of Antrim, who were both set at liberty without any sinful obligations, or any thing imposed on their conscience at all: and in like manner were the five ministers at Dublin set at liberty.

[MSS. Minutes of the Presbytery of Antrim.]

Rules for Ordination of ministers, "rebus ut nunc stantibus."

I. Rules to be observed previous to the trials.

First, it is judged convenient that no person be admitted to trials without testimonials from ministers where they have formerly resided according to former acts; which testimonials should bear not only the integrity of their personal carriage, and their fitness for the work of the ministry in general according to

* There are a few very slight inaccuracies here, not surprising, when it is recollected that Mrs. Goodall wrote this account above twenty years afterwards, and that, even at the time, she could not be expected to be very minutely acquainted with the particulars. There were four ministers imprisoned at Lifford, not at Dublin, though they were taken up there in order to be liberated; and Sir Arthur Forbes was not lord-deputy when he procured the order alluded to, but one of the lords-justices.

known Scripture rules, but also [such] as may hold forth the party's piety, peaceableness, prudence, and other degrees of fitness as may peculiarly capacitate him for such a charge as he may be called to.

Secondly, because it is necessary that meetings proceed to such a necessary work as ordination not upon the testimony of others only, but upon experience and so much knowledge of the person's parts and practice as may be attained. Therefore it is judged convenient that the person to be admitted to trials in order to ordination should converse for some space of time with the brethren amongst whom he is to officiate, during which time he may be employed to preach not only in vacant congregations, but with ministers in their congregations and in their hearing, so that they may have proofs of their gifts for preaching, and by conference may know their piety and prudence and stock of learning; in doing whereof the design of trial should be as little discovered to the party as may be; and for the space of time for the persons thus conversing we judge it may be left to the judgment and discretion of each meeting, as they shall find the person's way more or less satisfying and convincing: yet always minding the apostle's rule, "lay hands suddenly on no man."

Thirdly, we think it will be a good expedient for our case that no person be so much as named or invited to any work amongst us, except beforehand we have some good probability that he will satisfy; because it will be dangerous for the person to be engaged on and then reported for insufficiency, and useless for ourselves, because the less fit he be the more ready he will be, if once reported, to spy out our liberty to our prejudice. Wherefore we think it not fit that any brother should take on any man publicly till he first privately have consulted his brethren who may know something of the person.

Fourthly, these things being done in order to his call and the brethren so far encouraged to proceed, a call may be given him by the elders and such of the people as desire him, who are to engage under their hand to subject themselves to his ministry, to give him encouragement competent to his work, and the meeting may concur. But that the design of secrecy (which is necessary in our case) be not frustrated, we think no more should be made known unto the people but that he is to preach among them (the purpose of his ordination being concealed); withal signifying to them that, ordained or not ordained, their call obligeth them to subject themselves to the word in his mouth, and foundeth such a relation betwixt him and them as they may not cast him off at their pleasure, nor he remove from them. Withal we judge it expedient that none concur in his call but such as we may judge lovers of the truth and well-willing to subject themselves to the ordinances of Christ and the government of His Church.

II. Rules to be observed in the trials of the persons to be ordained.

First, we judge it necessary that these trials be as exact and full as ever, that is, that they be tried by addition, exercise, popular sermon, common head, and disputes; questionnaire trials in the sense of Scripture, in seemingly contradictory cases and in chronology, with trial of the tongues; that in the worst of times able and fruitful ministers may be continued amongst us.

Secondly, tho' the trials of the persons to be ordained are to be gone about with all convenient secrecy, yet that all may have satisfaction in a matter wherein all are concerned, it is judged convenient that not only all the brethren of the meeting where the person to be tried is to officiate be present, but also these meetings with which they use to correspond be advertised to send correspondents to assist at every part of his trials, if it can be, but at least at the last part of the trials; viz., common head, disputations, and questions that are ordinarily proposed.

Thirdly, in regard a formal edict cannot be served and returned, as our case now stands, we think that where men are to be ordained the meeting should send some of their number to visit those congregations, and inquire concerning the life and doctrine of the preacher; and particularly how they would be satisfied to have him to be their minister, and if nothing be found among them like an objection, we judge that the inquiry may serve for an edict in our case.

III. A rule to be observed in the work of ordination.

All things being thus far clear in order to ordination, we think fit that either the whole meeting, or (where the meeting is numerous) the major part at least, with the correspondents of the neighbour meetings, together also with some of the congregation to which the person is to be ordained, either elders or in case there be no elders, some others whom the meeting may judge faithful and prudent to keep secret the matter, meet in some convenient and private place; where, after one appointed by the meeting hath preached concerning the nature and necessity of the the work of the ministry, and after the intrant hath given distinct and positive answers to the questions usually proposed for showing his soundness in the faith, and adhering to the truth professed in the Reformed Churches against Popery, Arminianism, Prelacy, Erastianism, Independency, and whatsoever else is contrary to sound doctrine and the power of godliness; and his resolution to adhere to the Covenant, and (considering the temper of these times) he is expressly and particularly to engage to peaceableness and subjection to his brethren in the Lord. These things being done, the brethren are to proceed to ordain him by imposition of hands, with fasting and prayer, and to give him the right hand of fellowship.

IV. Rules to be observed after ordination.

First, the newly-ordained person is to forbear those acts which appertain to him as such till he go to Scotland or some other place out of the bounds of the meeting where he was ordained; where he may stay for some time and begin the practice of the ministerial acts, yet sparingly and by degrees.

Secondly, as he returns to the country he is to perform duties peculiar to an ordained minister before he come to the meeting.

Lastly, at the first meeting of the brethren after his return, he is to be received by his brethren as an ordained minister and the member of the meeting, and that in presence of some of his congregation who are, in the name of the congregation, to receive him as their minister.

Address of the Presbytery of Down to the Lord-Lieutenant in June, 1617; together with the letter of the Presbytery of Lagan to Lord Granard, in September following.

[MSS. Bibl. Jurid., Edin. Wodrow MSS., 4to, 36. Rob. iii., 3, II.]

To his Grace the Duke of Ormond, Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland.

The humble petition of several Presbyterian ministers in the north of Ireland, whose names are under-written. Humbly sheweth,

That whereas we understand there are bad representations made of us to your lordship and other magistrates of this kingdom, as if our principles and practices were not answerable to the duty and manifold obligations we are under to his majesty, our dread sovereign, as if we were privy, and had accession to the present insurrection in Scotland, whereof we declare ourselves altogether free;—We judge it incumbent to us, for obviating such groundless surmises, in all humility, in conscience of our duty and loyalty, to testify that since our entry to our ministry we have always held it a matter of special and high consequence, by which we are bound by divine precept, to carry with all due reverence and obedience unto the King's majesty and his authority; whereof we humbly presume we have given such undeniable evidences by appearing on that account, as we had access, in the whole series of our ways both before the King's happy restoration and since, as no impartial observer who has been witness to our ways can deny: Whereof our own consciences do abundantly bear us witness, which also his sacred majesty upon due information hath been graciously pleased to own. And at this present we judge ourselves obliged from the same unswervable principles of conscience and loyalty to declare the steadfastness of our resolution to continue in the same loyalty and due obedience to his majesty's authority, from which if we would resile we must be accounted most undutiful to God and ungrateful to our most gracious sovereign, having enjoyed so great proofs of his royal goodness and special favour, many ways manifested towards us.

May it therefore please your grace that as you have not been wanting in the exercise of your government, under his majesty, to evidence your favour and noble candour towards us, so your grace would be pleased for the future to retain favourable constructions of us, as his majesty's loyal though poor subjects, that we may live a peaceable and quiet life in all godliness and honesty under his majesty's government and protection, and not receive misrepresentations from those who desire our halting, while we be first heard and admitted to answer for ourselves ; and we shall always esteem it a great duty to continue daily orators at the throne of grace for his sacred majesty, his long and happy reign, and also for all happiness and divine conduct to your Grace in that high and honourable station wherein you are placed under his majesty. Letter of the Presbytery of Lagan to Lord Granard, in September, 1679.

[MS. Minutes of Lagan Pres., penes Rev. Dr. Bruce, Belfast.]

My Lord,

It has pleased God to make your lordship such a comfortable instrument under his majesty of our liberty in the time of our distress, that as we judge ourselves bound to bless God for the peace we have enjoyed, and thankfully to acknowledge his majesty's clemency and the constancy of your lordship's care and kindness towards us; so we cannot but presume to make application to your lordship upon emergent difficulties. May it please your lordship therefore to consider that we, being but lately informed, and now persuaded of the hazard we are in through various misrepresentations and aspersions, do judge that a new and joint address to his sacred majesty at this time were very convenient that we might again declare our loyalty and faithfulness to our dread sovereign for our own vindication. But finding that, through the great distance at which we lie scattered such a joint and unanimous address (although most desirable and seriously aimed at by us and the rest of our brethren in the north of Ireland) cannot be gotten speedily effectuated we judge it our duty at present to declare to your lordship our constant and serious purpose and endeavour, thro' the grace of God, to remain steadfast in our loyalty and obedience to our dread sovereign, and that we do and will (according to our known principles from which we hope through grace never to swerve) continue to pray for his majesty's person and government, and pay tribute and other dues, and obey his lawful commandments; and, wherein, we cannot in conscience actively obey his majesty's laws, yet peaceably to submit to his majesty's undoubted authority over us; exhorting the people among whom we labour to beware of all seditious disturbances among his majesty's subjects, and finally whatsoever is contained in, or may by sound consequence be drawn from, our Confession of Faith asserting our duty to the magistrate, we are willing to own. But if it be thought necessary that, at present, a joint and unanimous address be made, we shall (God willing) forthwith set about it. However, in the meantime, we humbly entreat your lordship that as you have formerly appeared and adventured to testify good for us to his sacred majesty, so your lordship would as you find opportunity again represent us to our dread sovereign as his loyal and obedient subjects: And as we hope your lordship will never have cause to repent or be ashamed of your so doing, so your lordship will thereby greatly oblige us to pray for your temporal and eternal happiness, who are your lordship's humble and obedient servants.

Some short account of the troubles that Messrs. William Trail, James Alexander, Robert Campbell, and John Hart, ministers in the Lagan, in the north of Ireland, met with upon account of a fast appointed by the presbyterial meeting in that bounds.

Upon the 2d of February, 1681, the meeting of the Presbyterian ministers in the Lagan met at St. Johnston, which was the ordinary place of meeting, and considering the providences of God towards His Church and people in Britain and Ireland, they judged it their duty to call the people under their inspection to humiliation, prayer and fasting, and appointed the 17th of that month to be observed as a day of fasting and prayer, and drew up a paper called the Causes of the said Fast.

On Friday, the 18th of March thereafter, the assizes at Lifford, in which parish Mr. Trail had his meeting-house, they were speaking of indicting the said Mr. Trail for a letter he had written to one Mr. Robert Simpson, the contents of which letter I cannot learn any more of than what is afterwards narrated by Mr. Trail himself in his account of his examination before the committee of the council. But they thought fit to let it alone, and there is nothing further found of this among Mr. Trail's papers. On the 7th of April that same year there was a rendezvous made of some companies of soldiers that lay in that country-side, and the oath of supremacy was put both to officers and soldiers; and severals did refuse, and particularly one Captain Barclay, who also kept it off all his company; and for this, severals of them were put in prison. And when Mr. Trail, on Tuesday, the 12th of that month, was visiting some of these that were put in prison for their refusing the foresaid oath, the justices of the peace of the Lifford sent a constable for him and convened him before them; where upon his appearing his mittimus to prison, which was ready written, was publickly read, and he was obliged to find bail to appear at the next assizes and be of the good behaviour till then. It seems they suspected he had some hand in obliging some to refuse the oath of supremacy when it was put to them ; but this was groundless as will be seen by his answers before the council at Dublin.

Upon the last of April, Mr. John Hart was called before five justices of the peace at St. Johnston, and questioned anent the "Causes of the Fast" in February last, but he craved time to answer because others were concerned. And upon this he by letters called a meeting of the brethren upon Monday, May the 2nd ; and when Mr. Trail came there that day, hearing the justices had been calling for the presbytery-book, he rode back to his own house and put it out of the way, and found there a letter waiting him requiring him to attend a meeting of the justices of the peace the next day at Raphoe. And accordingly the next day he went to Raphoe, and the justices there present were Sir William Stewart, Gray Bingley, the high-sheriff, Captain Nesbitt, Hugh Hamil, John Forward, and Michael Sampson. They either had or pretended to have a commission for what they did from the lord-lieutenant. And here Mr. Trail and the other three ministers did confess and subscribe their accession to the drawing up of the causes of the fast formerly mentioned, and that they had kept the fast on the day appointed ; and then they were let go home. Upon the 8th and 9th of June thereafter, four of the ministers of that bounds received summons to appear within eight days after the date thereof before the lord-lieutenant and council at Dublin. These that were summoned were Mr. John Hart, Mr. James Alexander, Mr. Robert Campbell, and Mr. William Trail, who presently put themselves in order for their journey, and arrived at Dublin upon the 16th of June. They stayed there some days till Monday, the 20th of that month, when Mr. John Hart and Mr. William Trail were examined, each of them for about half an hour or some more, before the lord-lieutenant and council met in the Castle of Dublin. I cannot learn what the rest of the ministers were examined upon ; but here is subjoined a distinct account of Mr. Trail's examination taken from his own papers :—

FIRST DAY'S EXAMINATION.

The examination of William Trail, before his grace the lord-lieutenant, and the most honourable privy-council of Ireland, at Dublin Castle, June 20, 1681.

LD. LT. Are you Mr. Trail? W. T. Yes. Here one of the lords said to the examinant—Be not afraid, be not surprised. W. T. I am not, for why should I? L. L. I shall begin without much preamble with you; was you at that meeting at St. Johnston where the causes of your late fast were drawn up? W. T. Yes. L. L. Who was with you there? W. T. I am not free to declare that, neither can I punctually remember. I confess my own accession to it, but I am not clear to tell of others to bring them into trouble. L. L. By what authority did you appoint that fast? W. T. We conceived that God was by His providence calling us to fast and pray; and a little before that the King had proclaimed a fast in England. L. L. How knew you that? W. T. We saw the proclamation in the public London Gazette. L. L. Did you preach a sermon before that fast, and did you enjoin the people to abstain from their labours on that day? W. T. I did preach on the Lord's-day before that fast, but whether I did desire the people to abstain from their labours I do not remember that nor can I well tell; but its like I did not, for there was no need of it, and fasts being no strange things with us, the people know that abstinence from their ordinary labours doth belong to their keeping of a fast; and they commonly and generally abstain from their labours on fasting days. L. L. Then it is a thing that follows of course upon your fasting days. W. T. Yes. Besides I am informed that Nonconformists of divers persuasions in this city did keep the same fasts about the same time. L. L. Was it so?—Here some of the lords of the council, sitting at the table, did affirm it to have been as the examinant had said.—L. L. Did you send orders from your meeting to others to keep that fast? W. T. We have meetings for consultation, and when anything is done or resolved upon amongst us, we used to send advertisement of it to these that were absent to let them know what is done. L. L. Have you not a clerk? W. T. We have not a fixed constant clerk, but sometimes one and sometimes another is employed to take a note of these things that are done among us, and I am as often employed as another. CHANCELLOR or PRIMATE.* Where is your book or papers wherein your records are, and who has them in keeping? W. T. I know not,

* This was Dr. Michael Boyle, who was removed from Dublin to Armagh, in 1678, and who held the office of lord-chancellor from 1663 till the accession of James II. He was a noted pluralist, having at one time held three bishoprics and six parishes.—Stuart's "Armagh," p. 389.

they are not in my custody. CHAN. In whose keeping were they then when you appointed that fast? W. T. They were then in my keeping. CHAN. Well, mark that!

CHAN. What do you mean in these causes of your fast (here he produced a copy of the Causes of the Fast) by apostacy, and perjury, and breach of our solemn covenants and vows? W. T. The breach of all our lawful vows and covenants, which are many; for we come under vows and covenants at baptism and at our partaking of the Lord's Supper, and upon other occasions.

CHAN. Whom do you mean by the antichristian party, when you say in the causes of your fast that we are in danger of a massacre by the antichristian party? W. T. By the antichristian party we mean the popish party. CHAN. But do you mean none other but only the popish party by the antichristian party?—At this question the examinant kept silent, being loath, as it seems, to answer; and then the chancellor proceeded to the next question.—

CHAN. Have you read the Solemn League and Covenant? W.

T. Yes, I have read it, though I never took it. CHAN. Doth not that call others the antichristian party, than the Papists? W. T.

I do not remember that there is any expression in the Covenant which calls the prelatical party the antichristian party. CHAN.

What say you then to your own letter to Mr. Simpson? Doth not that call others the antichristian party than Papists? Would you know your own hand-write?—And here he produced that missive letter.—W. T. I acknowledge I wrote some such letter as that, and it is like that is mine; but the man that would be so base as to betray my private letter might also vitiate it, and I have no copy of it. L. L. Take it and look upon it, and see whether it be so or not, and if there be any underlining in it. W. T. It is needless.—Then the chancellor caused the clerk of the council to read the letter in open hearing.—W. T. Now there is no expression in that letter calling the prelatical party the antichristian party. There is indeed something there reflecting upon some of the churchmen, but nothing against the government of church or state. Your grace (directing his speech to the lord-lieutenant) knows theologorum odia, and that we use to be somewhat sharp in our arguing one with another; and it is little wonder considering what hard measures we met with from our antagonists. L. L. Sure I am there has no hardship been put upon your party now of a long time. W. T. If I were purged of this I am accused of, and had the place of an accuser, I could show unto your grace several hardships that have been lately put upon us. There is one mentioned in that letter even now read, and there was another lately put upon me, although I desire not to mention any man's name, nor to bring any man into trouble. I was sent to prison, my mittimus was written and read to me before some justices, and I was upon bail bound over to the next assizes for no fault, but merely for going into the jail to see some prisoners. L. L. But for what fault were they put in? W. T. For refusing the oath of supremacy. L. L. So. W. T. But I spake nothing that did give offence, and I went in in company with one of the commissioners of array, and I said nothing that could be quarrelled at that time.

CHAN. Do you think it lawful to take an oath before the magistrate? W. T. I think it not only lawful but duty to take an oath before the magistrate, when called to it. L. L. Why then did you refuse to swear at Raphoe? W. T. Because it was an unlawful oath that was then put to me, which I was not clear to swear. L. L. What oath was it? W. T. That I should make full and true answer to all questions that should be demanded of me. L. L. You did well to refuse that oath. CHAN. Did you compose or frame an oath to be taken by the people in the place of the oath of supremacy? W. T. I never composed any oath. I know that that is a matter of very great consequence, nor did I ever desire any person to take any oath. L. L. Did you ever take the oath of supremacy? W. T. No. I was never put to it. L. L. Did you dissuade any from taking it? W. T. No; for aught I know or can remember; nor had I occasion of so doing. There was only one gentleman in the parish who spoke to me about it, and I said to him that in a matter that was like to bring him to suffering he behoved to walk by his own light, and to have clearness in his own mind; and I gave him no other advice in the case, nor was I willing at that time to advise him. SIR JOHN KEATING, lord-chief-justice of the common pleas, said, But, Mr. Trail, seeing you pretend to have the charge of their souls, how could you refuse to give them advice, when they came to ask it of you? W. T. There was no need of much advice at that time, for the gentleman had, the day before, refused the oath; and after he had refused the oath was dismissed by the justices and commissioners of array at Raphoe, upon his parole to return to them the next day; and he was going back again to Raphoe, and in the way accidentally met with me. But he came not on errand to ask my advice. L. L. But will you now take the oath of supremacy? W. T. I am not free to take it. But to let your grace see that I have no very great abhorrency of that oath, I do acknowledge that it's capable of a sound sense, and that there is a sound sense put upon it by law, and that the XXXVII. article of the Church of England and several acts of parliament have put a sound sense upon it, and that the LVIII. article of the confession of Ireland doth put a sound sense upon it, and Doctor Ussher's sense of it is also sound: all which I acknowledge. L. L. Why then do you not take it, for I never took it in another sense? W. T. Because I think it were a juggling with the King and much more with God to take an oath that is capable of a sound sense, and yet to keep that sound sense in my mind. But let the sense be written down together with the oath plainly, and this will clear the matter. The LVIII. article of Ireland has the very words of the oath of supremacy, and the sense of them immediately subjoined.—Here the examinant produced a printed copy of the articles of Ireland, which the Earl of Drogheda took out of his hand, and read the LVIII. article* before the council; and then the examinant said:—And I am free to subscribe that article and all the rest of the articles of that confession.—And as the examinant saw divers of the lords of council looking upon that copy of the articles of Ireland which he had delivered, and taking notice of the title-page and the year of its being printed, viz., 1681; he said further—I have seen these articles printed of an older edition. You need not stand upon the edition. I bought that but the other day since I came to town; but it is the same with the older editions.—And while divers were looking upon that copy of the Irish articles which he had presented, and were handing it about from one to another, he said—I hope your grace and this honourable board will pardon and excuse my freedom and boldness in speaking, if

* The following is a copy of this article :—" We do profess that the supreme government of all estates within the said realms and dominions in all causes, as well ecclesiastical as temporal, doth of right appertain to the King's highness. Neither do we give unto him hereby the administration of the Word and sacraments, or the power of the keyes; but that prerogative only which we see to have been always given unto all godly princes in Holy Scripture by God himself; that is, that he should contain all estates and degrees committed to his charge by God, whether they be ecclesiastical or civil, within their duty, and restrain the stubborn and evil-doers with the power of the civil sword."

"Art. of Irel." London, 4to., 1629.

I speak not with that reverence and respect that is due ; I hope the candour of this honourable board is such as not to construe amiss of my boldness. L. L. (smiling) I like you very well, Mr. Trail ; you may speak what you please. CHAN. But do you acknowledge the King's supremacy ? W. T. Yes. CHAN. But do you acknowledge the King's supremacy in ecclesiastical matters ? W. T. Yes. We allow unto the King a supremacy in ecclesiastical matters. CHAN. But do you acknowledge that the King has power to establish the ecclesiastical government ? W. T. Yes, and that we do, too. But I will deal ingenuously with your grace—still directing his face and speech to the lord-lieutenant, as he had done all along—I do not believe that the King has power to set up what government he pleases in the Church ; but that he has power to set up the due and true government of the Church. CHAN. O then, all this is nothing ; for who shall be judge of the true government ? W. T. May it please your grace—speaking always to the lord-lieutenant, whose face was towards him, but the chancellor sat with his back to the examinant—there is no difference betwixt us and the prelatical party as to the King's power. We are herein as full in asserting of the King's power as they are, for many of them hold their government to be jure divino as we hold ours ; so that the difference is not about the King's power, but his setting up of the one government or the other. L. L. All the difference then is, that when the King sets up the one government you say he is in the right ; and when he sets up the other, they say he is in the right. Is not this it ? W. T. That same is what I would say ; if it please your grace.—Here the lord-lieutenant and the whole table fell a laughing, and the examinant finding himself somewhat warm in his replies did again with success crave pardon for his boldness and freedom of speech, and appealed again to the candour of that honourable board.—CHAN. But you make resistance. W. T. We make no resistance. CHAN. But you can or may make resistance. W. T. A man may go mad.—Here again the board fell a laughing.—CHAN. But you say it's lawful to make resistance. Were not Calvin and Knox brave men ; what say you to them ? W. T. Whatever the men were we do not hold ourselves bound to adhere to everything they said. The best of men may have their errors ; particularly Calvin was too lax in the matter of the Sabbath. CHAN. But it is not lawful to make resistance ? W. T. May it please your grace—always speaking to the lord-lieutenant—this is hard to put such a mean subject as I am and a man of my coat so to it, to answer such questions, which must be determined by judges and lawyers how far it is permittable by law, and according to the covenant betwixt the King and the people. Then the lord-lieutenant dismissed Mr. Trail, and after a little space he was called in again and asked whether he had said that he could subscribe all the articles of Ireland, to which he answered affirmatively. Hereupon one of the lords of council said to the rest—Then he will do it seeing he had said it. And so he was again dismissed.

N.B. The rumour of Mr. Trail's offering to subscribe the confession of Ireland flew through the town of Dublin before he was dismissed from the council, and raised such a curiosity in all that heard of it to know that confession better, that every body ran to buy them so fast that against nine o'clock at night there was not a copy of them to be found in any stationer's shop in Dublin; and the prelatical clergy in Ireland were much ashamed of it that a Dissenter should offer to subscribe their confession.

SECOND DAY'S EXAMINATION.

The examination of William Trail before a committee of his majesty's most honourable privy-council, in the kingdom of Ireland, at Dublin, in the council-chamber, June 22d, 1681. The Archbishop of Dublin, president:—

ABP. Were you at that meeting at St. Johnston, where the causes of the fast were drawn up? W. T. Yes. ABP. Who was with you? W. T. I am not free to tell, nor do I punctually remember. ABP. Did you observe that fast? W. T. Yes. ABP. By what authority did you appoint that fast? W. T. We did it at the call of God and his providence; part of which providence was the King's declaration which we saw in the public gazette, at the desire of the parliament, enjoining a fast in England. ABP. But that declaration did not reach us in Ireland. W. T. Then we gave a superabounding obedience. ABP. Did you enjoin that fast unto the people? W. T. No. But we tell them that we think it is the will of God that they should fast and pray, and set a day apart for the public and joint performance and exercise of this great duty; and we exhort them to it, and they voluntarily come. We use to forbear all words of power and authority ; whatever authority we may claim as ministers of the Gospel, we commonly waive that. And as Paul said to Philemon, "Whereas as I might be much bold in Christ to enjoin thee that which is convenient, yet for love's sake I rather beseech thee;" so we, whatever power we have as ministers to command, yet for prudence sake we rather beseech. Beside we claim no other power but what your own confession of faith allows to the ministers of the Gospel, viz., the authority of the keys. ABP. But we, although we do not give unto the King the power of the keys or power to preach and administer the sacraments ; yet we do not take upon us to appoint a fast without him. W. T. You cannot so well do it as we ; for it would be an encroachment upon the King's authority for you to appoint a fast, because what you do of that kind you do it by authority and command. But it is not so with us. ABP. That is to say, that we are under authority and you are under none. W. T. Not so. But you, in your appointing of fasts, authoritatively command and enjoin them, and we only beseech the people, and so we do not encroach upon the King's authority. ABP. Has the King the only power of appointing fasts and enjoining them ? W. T. That the King has power to appoint fasts we do not deny, but acknowledge : yet every man has power to appoint a fast to himself, and a master of a family to his family, and so every society within itself. I grant I see not how a national fast can be well kept over a whole kingdom or nation without the consent of the supreme magistrate, but his consent is not so needful for a fast in a corner. ABP. But yours was a public fast and not in a corner. W. T. What is the Lagan there—looking to a great map of Ireland that was hanging at the back of the table—but a small corner of the King's dominions. We gave evidence of our own owning and acknowledging the magistrate's power to appoint and enjoin public fasts, for we observed the fast appointed by authority in May, 1679, though divers of the conform clergy observed it not, because they got not the printed brief about it timeously sent them from Dublin. But to determine punctually how far the King's power goes in this matter of fasts, and how far the Church's power goes, and to set the limits of these, I cannot, for I am but a young man, and since I entered into the ministry, we have not had the free exercise of discipline, and so I have had little occasion to be well acquainted with these controversies. ABP. How long is it since you came to Ireland ? W. T. Ten years. But as to the nature of a fast we do not make the time holy when we keep a fast, but the day is our own when the fast is<sup>o</sup>ver. But it is not so on the Lord's-day for that is holy. The time is holy, and the worship waits upon the time; but in our fasts<sup>f</sup> the time waits upon the worship. ABP. It is even so on the Lord's-day, and it's all one. The time is no more holy upon the Lord's-day than upon a fast-day. W. T. If this were a fit place for dispute I would endeavour to prove the contrary. ABP. We will not dispute. W. T. I desire it may be remembered that whereas I did the other night before the council offer to subscribe all the articles of the confession of faith of Ireland, 1615, that I understood the LXXVII. article or paragraph of circumstantial, not of doctrinal, ceremonies; and this I declare before this honourable board, lest I should be mistaken or misunderstood. ABP. You need not fear nor trouble yourself about that, for you shall not be put to subscribe that confession.

ABP. What mean you in the causes of your fasts by "apostacy and perjury in the breach of our religious covenants and vows?" W. T. I mean the breach of all our religious covenants, in as far as they are lawful. The reason why I say, in as far as they are lawful, is, because our covenants being but forms or draughts of human contrivance, cannot be altogether perfect and may readily have some σφάλμα and some tokens of human infirmity and imperfection in them. ABP. Whom do you mean by the antichristian party in the Causes of the Fast? W. T. By the antichristian party we mean always the popish party. ABP. Only the popish party? W. T. I say, always the popish party. ABP. Have you presbyteries? W. T. We have meetings for consultation, but we use not commonly to call them presbyteries. ABP. Have you a clerk, and who writes your orders? W. T. Sometimes one and sometimes another is appointed to take a note of what is agreed or resolved upon; but we call not these things orders. We forbear all such words of authority. What is written is rather an historical record of what passes among us than anything else; and we have no fixed and constant clerk. ABP. Did you ever take the oath of supremacy? W. T. No. It was never put to me. ABP. Will you take it now? W. T. Not as it stands; but with the sense of it as it is explained by the XXXVII article of England, and the LVIII of Ireland, and Dr. Ussher's speech in the Star-Chamber, I agree unto. Besides—said he, smiling—I lie under the punishment imposed by law for refusing the oath of supremacy. Then one of the committee said—What is that? W. T. I want all preferment. LORD LANESBOROUGH. But would you take it if they would give you a good benefice? W. T. No, my lord, I have not said that yet. I am content to be as I am without that. ABP. Did you dissuade any from taking the oath of supremacy? W. T. No. Neither had I occasion for it. ABP. Was you at that great meeting at Donoughmore that was continued from Thursday, June 2d, to Monday, June the 6th? W. T. That was no great meeting, but such as we have usually at communions. Neither was it continued from Thursday till Monday. There was a fast indeed on the Thursday, as we commonly use to have in such cases. ABP. Was you there? W. T. Yes. I did preach at the fast on the Lord's-day evening. ABP. Within or without? W. T. Within doors. ABP. Who called you thither? W. T. The ministers of the place. We are not so weary of being at home, as to go to a neighbouring congregation without a call.

ABP. Do you use to ride through the country with arms, swords, and pistols? W. T. (smiling said) I came to Dublin without a sword. There is neither sword nor gun about my house. I think I am one of the greatest cowards in his majesty's dominions, and that they are all fools that fight. LORD LANESBOROUGH. What say you to them that must live by it? W. T. I am no Anabaptist. I think it lawful for a Christian under the New Testament to be a soldier, and also to kill men in a good quarrel. But I was speaking as to myself and to my own inclination.—The examinant could never look upon blood, neither his own or others, without falling into a swoon at the sight.—ABP. Do you know that Mr. Inett is minister of Lifford? W. T. I know that he is the regular incumbent of Lifford. ABP. Do you know or believe that the bishops of England have deserted or betrayed the Protestant interest? W. T. I do not know that they have done so. There is some expression like that in that sorry and pitiful letter to Mr. Robert Simpson; but I suppose it is not plainly asserted, but hinted at by way of doubt or surmise, or with it seems, or some such extenuating word. But I will not justify that letter. It was written in haste on a Saturday morning when I had something else to think upon: and it was written but upon the eighth part of a sheet of paper, and that of a small volume. SIR WM. STEWART. Then if you acknowledge a fault in it, we will make no more of it. LORD GRANARD. It was a foolish letter. W. T. Whatever folly or rashness was in writing of it, there was a baseness in betraying of it. But I am often disappointed in my charity to some men. Besides, if you please, I can presently produce some of Mr. Simpson's letters to me, after that of mine to him, wherein he shows that the bishop of Raphoe was satisfied with my ingenuity [ingenuousness] in my vindication of that letter. ABP. There is no need to produce these letters.

ABP. Do you know of any design of a foreign invasion upon the kingdom of Ireland?—The archbishop did read this question again and again before the examinant gave any answer.—W. T. I know of none but what I have discovered. LORD LANESBOROUGH. What have you discovered? W. T. I was one of three who did, by letter, discover to the government some design of foreigners upon this kingdom of Ireland. The letter was directed to my Lord Granard, who is here present and can declare it, although I never spoke with him in my life, nor did I ever see him till the other night that I saw him at the council-table. LORD GRANARD. I do not remember. W. T. I will put your lordship in mind of it. That letter was written on the 10th of August, 1677, near four years ago, and more than a twelvemonth before Dr. Oates opened his mouth in England to discover the plot. SIR W. STEWART. That was before my lord-lieutenant came over. W. T. No. This same lord-lieutenant was here then, and it was soon after his coming over to the government. L. GRANARD. Was that Mr. Taylor's business? W. T. Yes, my lord, the same. L. GRANARD. O now I remember it, and he got ten guineas from my lord-lieutenant. W. T. He did so, my lord. I will not say what influence it might have had upon the State; but sure I am it was a most wicked and dangerous trepan for us. We were offered the aid and assistance of French Protestants, as they called them, and ammunition, arms, and money from abroad—yea, the consent and assistance of our own king, if we would make a party and concur to pull down the prelates. The wicked contrivers of that design knew very well that we would hearken to nothing wherein the King was concerned without his own consent, therefore that also was offered to us. Yet if we had but kept it up a little while, we had been guilty. And it was late, about eleven o'clock at night, when it was revealed to us; and the first thing we did next morning, after a sleep and prayer, was to discover it by writing a letter by the post to Lord Granard, and I appeal to your lordship's memory. L. GRANARD. There was something of it. Captain Rutherford denied some of these things which Mr. Taylor said, and he had discovered something of it to the secretary in England. W. T. I wrote that letter and with other two of my brethren subscribed it ; and I have the only copy of it extant beside the principal copy that was sent to Lord Granard. L. GRANARD. I know where that is. W. T. And I never gave a copy of it to any, but we kept it up for a long time, even from our brethren. L. LANESBOROUGH. Have you that letter here? Where is it? W. T. I have it here. L. LANESBOROUGH. Let us see it. W. T. It's in short-hand, but I shall read it to your lordships presently.—Here the examinant took out his letter-case and produced that letter, and read it openly and audibly, as it is here entered, together with the subscribers' names :—

“ My lord, may it please your lordship. One Mr. James Taylor, a faithful and godly minister in the county of Fermanagh living within two miles of Inniskilling and one of our number,* having revealed unto him a matter of very dangerous consequence to his majesty's government, if real, and being but a stranger unacquainted with the law in this country, and not knowing what might be the fittest way to discover the same ; yea was in doubt whether to disclose it to any person or not, supposing it might be altogether a fiction ; he could not be at rest, being a very faithful subject, till he yesternight (and we can declare upon oath that it was no sooner discovered unto us) acquainted and had the advice of us, the underscribers, what was fit for him to do in the case. Whereupon we, having heard what was discovered unto him, we could hardly judge it anything else but a mere romance ; yet if it should fall out otherwise (which God forbid) and be found true, it would prove very prejudicial to his majesty's interest and

* The Rev. James Tailzeor, as the name was then spelled, came from Scotland in May, 1675, with recommendatory letters from the Rev. Thomas Hegg, of Kilsarn, in the north of Scotland. (Hogg's “Mem.,” p. 29.) In August following he received a call from the people of Monagh, Enniskillen, and Derryvalon, to be their minister, promising him £44 per annum, and he was accordingly ordained to this charge by the Presbytery of Lagan, on the 14th of September, 1675. In April, 1679, he was imprisoned at Enniskillen, and on the 25th, on pretence of his wanting a written certificate of his being a minister in the Presbytery, in consequence of complaints from the people of Derryvalon, “ discharging him from meddling any more with the practice of physic or medicine.” What afterwards became of him I have not ascertained ; but in 1681, the Rev. Robert Kelso, formerly minister at Wicklow, was minister of this charge at Enniskillen.

government, and to the peace of his kingdoms ; seeing there was no less surmised to our foresaid brother, by a gentleman who sometimes was a captain abroad, than heading of a party to be furnished with money and ammunition from foreign parts. And, therefore, in conscience of our duty, as faithful subjects, Christians and ministers, we could not but forthwith discover it unto your lordship ; and as we have not imparted it to any, so we judged it convenient not to communicate it to any but unto your lordship, and if your lordship see it expedient you may send to Inniskilling for the said Mr. Taylor, who will be ready at your lordship's call to reveal all unto your lordship that was revealed unto him. He was willing to have come instantly unto your lordship, but was advised rather to wait your lordship's commandment, not knowing but the whole business may prove fabulous, and being therefore unwilling to make any noise about it ; especially seeing (as the matter was reported to him) he could apprehend no hazard of any sudden disturbance. Thus commending your lordship to the grace of God, we rest, my lord,

“Your lordship's humble servants,

“JOHN HART, ROBERT CRAIGHEAD, W. TRAIL.

“Taboia, August 10, 1677.”

L. LANESBOROUGH—hearing Mr. Hart's name read as one of the subscribers of that letter, said—is that this Hart that is here? W. T. The same, my lord.—Then the lords called for a sight of the paper, which the examinant did give out of his hand unto them ; and they handed it about from one to another but could not read it, and so again delivered it again to the examinant.—L. LANESBOROUGH. Transcribe it, and give us in a copy of it. W. T. I shall do so, my lord ; and I am content it be compared with the principal copy which was sent some years ago to our governors, that you may see whether it be not the very same with the subscribed copy, and that they agree perfectly, and if you please I shall give in this short-hand copy also. I hope this honourable board will excuse me for discovering this business at this time ; I was constrained to it by the question that was put to me about a foreign invasion. SIR W. STEWART. You have done yourself a piece of good service in so doing. W. T. I was tempted almost to discover it lately when I was examined at Raphoe. For your honour—directing his speech to Sir William who had spoken last—may remember that when I was asked there, who were with me at the drawing up of the Causes of the Fast, I refused to tell and said, I was not free to tell; and Captain Nesbitt said, “What if your brother were hatching a rebellion against the King would you not tell?” and I replied that in that case I would tell as soon as any man: and then I had almost told this that I have now discovered. But I thought it was not meet to discover it before a meeting of justices. L. LANESBOROUGH. You did well in that. You have now reserved it to the proper place, and it deserves thanks. W. T. What we did in this discovery I think we did it not only from a principle of conscience and duty to the King’s majesty, but also of interest; as not hoping it will be so well with us under the government of any as his present majesty.—Then the examinant was dismissed, and as he was leaving the room he said,—I would entreat this honourable board to believe that we are loyal subjects, and that if we have erred in point of loyalty it was not out of design but mistake. L. LANESBOROUGH. I believe that of you, Mr. Trail.

After the examinations of the said four ministers were over, they are upon Monday, the 27th of the same month, by the council referred to the assizes at Lifford; and the 1st of July they wait upon Sir William Davis, lord chief-justice of the king’s bench, who took their recognizance that they should appear at next assizes at Lifford; and he gave them a certificate for which they paid 6s. 8d. sterling, and 12s. sterling more to the clerks for their recognizances, and were obliged to find bail. And so they went home; and on Monday, the 8th of August, the said four ministers waited upon the assizes to which they were bound over by the council. And upon Wednesday, the 10th of that month, the grand jury found the bill against them valid; and after the petty jury (which was packed against them on purpose) had given in their verdict, they were fined by Judge Osborne, or Serjeant Osborne, £20 sterling each for appointing and keeping a fast. They were also appointed to take the bonds of behaviour, or then to remain prisoners in Lifford; which, after they had thought upon it and advised with friends, they chose rather to do; and the next day being the 11th of August they gave up themselves prisoners, resolving to continue prisoners rather than take the bonds of behaviour, or engage to pay their fine. During the time of their imprisonment, which was allowed them in a house in the town or in the castle, they always preached every Lord's-day by turns. But sometimes their hearers were driven away ; and particularly on the 8th of October, 1681, a gentleman's servant, as he was going to hear the prisoners, was apprehended by the officers of the town, and bid go to church, and because he would not he was put in the stocks.

Their imprisonment continued till the 20th of April, 1682, [above eight months], when they were dismissed by the sheriff upon giving bonds to keep the sheriff harmless of their fines in case he should be called in question. During the time of their imprisonment they applied several times by petition to the council of Dublin and court of exchequer for having their fines remitted or modified, without any success. But at last on the 25th of July, after they were liberated, they got, by order of the court of exchequer, their fines reduced from £20 to 20s. ; only each paid to the clerks of the crown 16s 5d. over and above : a double of which order is yet extant. As enemies were not wanting to show malice against them, both in and out of prison, one instance whereof was the drunken gentry and justices of the peace did upon the next 29th of May, 1682, burn the effigies of the Earl of Shaftesbury and Mr. Trail ; so their friends, whom the Lord stirred up, were not wanting in sending them money and other necessaries during their confinement.

List of the Presbyterian Ministers in Ireland. March, 1689.

[Wodrow MSS., Bibl. Jurid., Edin., Rob. iii., 6, 12.]

List of Presbyterian ministers in Ireland and come from it, May 20th, 1689, presented, at their request, to the General Assembly at Edinburgh by Messrs Osborne, Hamilton Craighead, Kennedy, Jo. Hamilton, and Legatt, ministers from Ireland.

Whereas we received advice from the worthy and reverend general meeting of the ministers of Scotland now met at Edinburgh, by divers brethren whom they sent to us, desiring we might give to them a true and just account of ali the Presbyterian ministers and probationers who walked orderly in the Presbyterian way throughout all Ireland, both in such places where they had access to converse with formed classes or presbyteries, and in such places where they had no such access to the established classes through the great distance of place and other difficulties. Also considering the hazard that may come to the Church of Scotland by reason of such persons who, for their own ends, may pretend to be Presbyterian and orderly ministers of Ireland. but really were not, and so may greatly injure both the Church of Scotland in their peace and purity, and the credit and integrity of the Church of Ireland ; do hereby and herewith give them a true and exact list and schedule of all such ministers and probationers as, to our distinct and certain knowledge, were in a ministerial capacity and orderly in our Presbyterian way, at or about the middle of March last : and with humble desire that no other persons be received by the Church of Scotland, in our name or as being of our way, but according to the subsequent list, whereunto we do give our testimony with all fidelity and impartiality, under our hands this 20th day of May, at Edinburgh 1689, Sic subscribitur,

SEE CHAPTER XXI., NOTE 27, PAGE 470.

[Extracts from the Minutes of the Corporation of Londonderry.]

At a Comon Council held the 12th day of Jany., 1697-8,

The said Committee having come to severall resolutions on the papers of Alderman Moncrieffe which being severally read and being fully debated here, and put to the question. This Comon Council do agree with the said Committee in all their resolutions ; which is as follows—viz<sup>t</sup>.

1. That on full examination of the paper called the case of Ald<sup>n</sup> Thomas Moncrieffe ; Resolved it is the opinion of the said Committee, That the Ald<sup>n</sup> has most untruly suggested, in his first assertion that he was first in order on place to have been elected Mayor instead of Ald<sup>n</sup> W<sup>m</sup> Squire, deceased, for that at the Comon Council that elected Ald<sup>n</sup> Lennox Mayor in the place of Ald<sup>n</sup> Squire, deceased, Ald<sup>n</sup> Moncrieffe was not then present, whereas the Comon Council by the Charter are obliged to elect and swear a Mayor within three days after the decease of the preceding Mayor : And that Ald<sup>n</sup> Lennox was not then elected because he was a dissenter, but because he was the best provided for undertaking the charge thereof, on such a sudden ; and that likewise it was in respect of seniority Ald<sup>n</sup> Lennox's turne, rather than Ald<sup>n</sup> Moncrieffe's, for that Ald<sup>n</sup> Lennox served for Sheriffe in anno 1685 and Ald<sup>n</sup> Moncrieffe served not Sheriffe till anno 1690.

5. That as to the said Ald<sup>ns</sup> leter to the Lord Chancellor ; It is most abusive to this incorporation, and contains only foul aspersions and false suggestions, for that no persons have been or are elected into the offices of Aldermen Burgesses or Sheriffs but those that are the most capable and able to serve his Majestie and this city in their respective offices. And that none of the Comunion of the Church of England are excluded as being such, but as they are not so well qualified for the offices, as those men are that are elected.

8. That it is the opinion of the said Committee that the opposition that has been so frequently given to the approbation of the elections of this Corporation, has been the only thing that brought the Corporation into debt, by their just defences of their said elections. That such opposition has been ever given by such as are not well affected to this City, nor to its true Interest; And it is most probable that the Incouragement they have had to move against the said Electiones, has been given them by some male-content members of this Incorporation, which is evidently plain and demonstrable from the Ald<sup>ns</sup> letter by his appealing for the truth of what he asserts to the testimony of the Ld. Bp. of Derry.

9. That upon serious consideration of the whole matter, it is the oppinion of this Comittee, that Ald<sup>n</sup> Thomas Moncrieffe hath in this matter been very injurious to the Corporation, for which he ought to begg pardon of the Corporation in Comon Council; and that in case of his refusing so to do, that he be by the Comon Councill declared a person not fitt to be be on any Election for the Mayoralty of this City at any time hereafter, till such submission be made.
